SHEARER DEAL NOT KNOWN TO HIM, HE AVERS

Comes With E. C. Grace for Senate Quiz on Navy Propaganda.

PRO-WAR ACTIVITY DECRIED BY BOTH

Bethlehem Steel Company Painted as Having Heart of Gold.

By CARLISLE BARGERON

The business of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation is steel, but it has a heart of gold, according to the story told to the Senate subcommittee investigating naval lobbyists yesterday by Charles M. Schwab and Eugene G. Grace.

Nothing would suit them better, they declared, than the scrapping of all battleships, the "sinking of them to the bottom of the sea," Schwab declared. Avowed disciples of their predecessor, Andrew Carnegie, in the matter of world peace, they declared they had never heard of William B. Shearer, the propagandist, until after his return from the Geneva naval arms parley and the word began to be noised around that the shipbuilding companies had sent him there.

Schwab might be said to have marked the public's changed attitude towards rich men. Before he developed as a steel magnate it was pretty generally the voice of the pulpit and the streets that a rich man would never get to Heaven. But Schwab, through the aid of the country's best publicity experts and his own personality, has largely dissipated this. He has a way of saying little human things, such as how to get rich, that he has never been loooked upon as was the elder Morgan or elder Rockefeller.

Praises His Secretary.

His secretary, "Mr. Ward," has helped him a lot, he disclosed yesterday.

"He has been with me for 30 years and he has protected me against many things," said Schwab. He protected Schwab, for instance, from Shearer, whom all the shipbuilders who have so far appeared before the committee now insist one should be protected from.

The secretarial records disclosed that Shearer had sought many times to see him, Schwab said, but to the best of his recollection he never laid eyes upon him.

Daniel H. Collahan, Shearer's attorney, insisted that the committee ask Schwab if he had not talked with Shearer at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel in New York in November, 1926.

"I have no recollection of such a meeting," Schwab suavely assured the committee. "Of course, you gentlemen understand I meet thousands of people. Certainly there was no such meeting as would impress itself upon my mind; certainly no business meeting."

Mr. Homer Mentioned.

Then Collahan insisted that Schwab be asked if the Geneva parley had not been discussed at that meeting and that Schwab had told him to see a "Mr. Homer."

"Mr. Homer?" questioned the kindly-looking Schwab in surprise. "Why we have no one by that name. He is not with us at all."

"Oh, let me correct, Mr. Schwab," interrupted Grace gently. "Mr. Homer is with us."

"Then who is he? What does he do?" asked Schwab, still greater surprised.

"He is on the New York selling force," replied Grace.

"Well, you see, gentlemen," Schwab turned to the committee. "It would have been impossible for me to tell him to see Mr. Homer, because I didn't even know him."

Magnate Looks Well.

Schwab, who is 67 years old, carries his age well. He is a big man in stature as well as finance. His waist line has gone beyond repair but there is a healthy air about his well-groomed being, the air, too, of a man who has drawn pretty well in life.

There was comment by Senator Robinson on how young he looked but Schwab handed the compliment right back.

"Ah, but it is you senators who retain your youth," he insisted gently. "I often wonder what your formula can be."

Schwab comes down to Washington not infrequently for investigations but they have never ruffled him. He has a way with Senate committees, which makes his visits most pleasant. But there was a little

NATS GIVEN 4 HITS; BEATEN BY BROWNS

Stewart Turns in Victory While Mates Hammer Jones Solidly.

ERRORS AID NATIONALS

By FRANK H. YOUNG.

The Nationals, who did the unusual Wednesday when they won a game on four hits, tried to give an encore at the Griffith Stadium yesterday, but failed, although, thanks to some weird fielding by the visitors, they did manage to make things interesting, finally going down by a 4-to-3 count. The victory, by the way, let the Browns pull into a third-place tie with the Indians, while it prevented the Nats from gaining a full game on the Tigers, who again bowed to the Athletics.

Walter Stewart, whom the Nats have beaten but once this season, was on the hill for St. Louis following a lay-off due to illness, but he looked like anything but an invalid yesterday. He kept the quartet of bingles he allowed scattered in as many different innings, and the only National able to do anything worth while was Shortstop Joe Cronin, who was credited with a triple and double.

Three Washington pitchers were used, and had Johnson called on either of the last two instead of "Sad Sam" Jones as a starter, the result might have been different, for Bob Burke and Garland Braxton granted but three hits between them while pitching shutout ball in the last six innings, during which not a Brownie got farther than first base.

The alien runs were scored in a brace of two-run rallies in the first third of the game. With one out in the first, McNeely doubled and took third on a wild pitch. When Manush lofted to West, it looked as though this bingle would be wasted, but Jones then walked Schulte and Kress came through with another two-bagger, which emptied the bases.

When the visitors were set down in rapid order in the second, it looked

BANNOCKBURN TITLE ANNEXED BY SHOREY

LEADS AT TURN, 3 UP

John C. Shorey, of the Host Club, yesterday won the championship in the Bannockburn invitation golf tournament, defeating Page Hufty, of Congressional Club, on the sixteenth green, 3 up and 2.

Shorey won the first hole by driving the green, 305 yards, and holing out in two putts for a birdie three. With the second hole halved, he won the third hole when he laid Hufty a stymie, but Hufty squared the match by winning the fourth in par and the fifth in a birdie three. With the sixth halved, Shorey won the next three holes, and was three up at the turn, with a card of 38 as against Hufty's 42.

With the tenth and eleventh halved, Hufty lost the twelfth by missing a 12-inch putt, but won the thirteenth in a par three when Shorey's drive hit a tree. The fourteenth was halved and the fifteenth should have been won by Hufty, but he was again laid a stymie by Shorey, so that he had to be content with a

ARMS COMPROMISE ENDS HOT DEBATE

BID FOR U. S. AID IS SEEN

Geneva, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—After three days of hot debate which stirred the assembly of the League of Nations, Great Britain and France today adopted a conciliatory manner in their dispute over the scope of the movement for general disarmament.

The two powers accepted a compromise which will leave the merits of their conflicting positions on the limitation of military forces to be determined later.

The settlement leaves England free to reopen the question of restricting the material and personnel for land warfare. Lord Cecil, spokesman for the empire, had said this restriction was essential to the ultimate success of the disarmament crusade.

France, by the terms of the compromise offered by M. Politis of Greece, gained her points that the assembly should not at this stage of the naval discussions agitate the question of general disarmament nor give fresh instructions to the preparatory disarmament committee.

Lord Cecil withdrew the British proposal, for which in any case a majority in the disarmament committee was doubtful. He announced, however, that his government at every opportunity would urge the

CRIME SCHOOL IS BLAMED FOR $512,000 PLOT

New York Police Believe Tutor Caused Boy to Rob Brokers.

PRISONER CONFESSES HE RECEIVED DOLLAR

Entire Theft Was "Plant," Commissioner Whalen Maintains.

New York, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—A big time crime coach of Wall street was hunted tonight on clews furnished by Milton Alter, 18-year-old brokers' messenger, who traded more than $500,000 in stolen securities for $1.

The R. V. Hiscoe Brokerage Co., the youth's employer, was out $512,00 in negotiable stocks and bonds, but police held the boy on a charge of grand larceny and had his detailed confession. In it he described the man who engineered the theft and through it Police Commissioner Grover A. Whalen hopes to reveal a crime school for financial district messenger boys and clerks.

The confession was obtained after the boy had been grilled practically all night. For hours he had maintained he had been kidnaped and dumped to a Brooklyn sidewalk after men in a limousine driven by a liveried chauffeur had taken the securities from him.

Many Discrepancies Found.

Many discrepancies occured in his story, however, and he later confessed he had taken the bonds at the urgins of a Jack Rosen, identity unknown, and had left them in his possession for the cost of a motion picture show, a subway ride and the nickels and dimes remaining out of a dollar.

After obtaining the confession from the boy, who had been employed by a furrier before he joined the Hiscoe Co. a month ago at a salary of $15 a week, Commissioner Whalen said:

"I believe that the boy was induced to leave his furrier job and to take a job in the financial district so that this principal crook could work through him. The whole thing was a plant from the start. It was arranged for Alter to go to work for a brokerage house. The crooks merely bided their time and waited their opportunity."

"This is but one of the many cases reported. There is an organized gang at work uptown, corrupting young boys, teaching them to be crooks and giving them thorough training in thievery before sending them to the financial district to get jobs. The boys get little of their work."

25,000 WATCH FILLY TRIUMPH IN GRAW RACE

JOCKEY ALLEN HOLDS WINNER OFF THE PACE

Rancocas Stable Scores a Double, With Zeal and Mei Foo Winning.

Special to The Washington Post.

Havre de Grace, Md., Sept. 21.—Rose of Sharon, the best filly here, stamped herself as a real champion when she added the $20,000 Potomac Handicap to the list of victories she has scored this season, beating a band of thirteen 3-year-olds. Coming from behind after being rated under stout restraint for six furlongs, Rose of Sharon dashed to the front when Allen let her down as they swung into the home stretch and for the remainder of the trip she held her opposition safe.

The Potomac was run as the fourth race and it brought to the post one of the best fields of 3-year-olds that have started in Maryland in some time. The Kentucky delegation made no secret of the fact that it would take a mighty good horse to beat Rose of Sharon and Senator Camden's filly went to the post favorite. Hard Tack was on his bad behavior at the post and when the barrier was sprung he refused to join the others and was left.

Beacon Hill Sets Pace.

Beacon Hill, quick to begin, had a slight margin rounding the first turn with Glen Wild in closest contention. This pair raced like a team down the backstretch, first one in front, then the other. Dinah Did Upset was third and well in hand and Rose of Sharon, who was tenth at the break, was being rated in the middle of the bunch. Not until well around the far turn did Allen release the Camden filly from restraint and when he did, Rose of Sharon responded with splendid courage.

At the finish she had something left. Glen Wild, racing next to the inside rail, was driving to the limit to stall off The Nut and he beat the latter out a neck for the place. Then followed Bossie and Soul of Honor. Dinah Did Upset, who had rather a rough trip, faded out of it the last furlong. This filly was sharply cut off at the three-furlong pole and the interference ruined whatever chances she may have had. The

British Schooner With Rum Seized

Crew of Seven Is Heavily Guarded; Boat Taken Off Montauk Point.

New London, Conn., Sept. 21 (A.P.).—The British auxiliary schooner Vinces was seized with a cargo of liquor of an estimated value of $50,000 off Montauk Point early today. The seizure was made by the Coast Guard patrol boat CG-290, in command of Boatswain A. C. Cornell. Seven men were aboard the seized vessel.

The patrol boat brought the schooner to the Coast Guard base at the State pier here and held the crew under heavy guard, pending arrival of customs authorities.

Deputy Collector Jeremiah Dillon, of the Customs Service, decided that the boat was seized within New York jurisdiction and that it probably would have to be taken to New York.

The cargo of alleged contraband is represented by about 1,000 cases of assorted liquor. It was learned that this apparently represented only part of the original cargo aboard the ship.

SENATOR ROBERT B. HOWELL.

ALLEN IS SUMMONED BEFORE GRAND JURY

SENATOR ASKS INQUIRY

Policeman Robert J. Allen, of the Third Precinct, who charges that he can prove that Mrs. Virginia McPherson was murdered in her apartment at the Park Lane apartments ten days ago and who alleges that she was officially adjudged a suicide only because the police homicide squad suppressed evidence and the coroner's jury was "stupid and negligent," will be given an opportunity to tell it to the District of Columbia grand jury.

Announcement was made yesteday by United States Attorney Leo A. Rover that he had subpenaed Allen to appear before the inquisitorial body Tuesday to present the facts, if any, to substantiate his beliefs.

Action followed a conference between Rover and Assistant United States Attorney William H. Collins, who has been assigned to the case. Collins conferred earlier in the day with Senator Lee S. Overman, of North Carolina, who is the man who brought the case to the attention of the United States attorney's office.

Overman, in his letter to Rover, pointed out that relatives of the woman, who reside in North Carolina, were not satisfied with the verdict of the coroner's jury.

Following the conference with Senator Overman, Collins stated that, while there was no apparent evidence to disprove the verdict of the coroner's jury, he would continue the investigation, and that persons who claimed to have additional information would be allowed to tell it to the grand jury.

Policeman Allen, as a result of his charges in connection with the McPherson case, has been ordered before the Police Trial Board, and unless he can substantiate his charges probably will be ousted.

Mrs. McPherson was found dead in her apartment on September 14. She

SECRET SERVICE CHECK OF LOCAL POLICE IS URGED

Howell, Nebraska, Says President Has Right to Enforce Law.

DISCHARGE THREAT ADVISED IN TALK

Tariff Debate Suddenly Swings Into Address on Prohibition.

The National Capital could be cleaned up if President Hoover would insist upon enforcement of the prohibition law, Senator Robert B. Howell (Republican) of Nebraska, declared in the Senate yesterday.

Howell said that the President was all-powerful in the District of Columbia and could call local officials before him and threaten to dismiss them if they failed to see that the law was enforced. Also, Howell said, he could assign the secret service to ferreting out prohibition violations.

Remarks Are Surprise.

Howell's remarks were made during a debate on the tariff, and were wholly unexpected. The Senate had been debating the opium traffic when the talk suddenly turned to prohibition.

"Enforcement in Washington can be made effective," Senator Howell said. "The President can dismiss any official in the city of Washington because such officials are his appointees, or are appointees of his appointees.

"In my opinion, if the President called the Commissioners before him and said, 'I have secret service officials at my command, and if they discover something here in connection with the violation of the prohibition law before you discover it, you are out'—if he did that, there is no question about what the result would be. There would be one city in the country that could be cleaned up."

Returns to Subject.

The discussion here turned to grand jury investigations of the opium traffic, but Howell soon brought it back to the liquor situation in Washington.

"What I say is," he declared, "that the President is all-powerful in the City of Washington and under the law can remove those officials when he sees fit, no matter if they must be approved by the Senate upon appointment."

Eleven Are Hurt In Speedway Meet

Mineola Track is the Scene of Two Automobile Accidents.

Mineola, N. Y., Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Eleven persons were injured, five of them seriously, in two accidents at the Mineola Speedway races at the fair grounds here this afternoon.

Ten of the persons were hurt when a racing car, driven by George Condon, dived over the fence and plunged into a group of spectators.

One woman and four children were among those injured. All were taken to hospitals.

Bob Robinson, race driver, of Daytona Beach, Fla., was critically injured just a few minutes before when his machine crashed through the fence on the opposite turn.

Human Cannon Ball, Injured in Stunt, Dies

Springfield, Mass., Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Harry Ackenhausen, 30, of Hanover, Germany, known to the circus world as "the human projectile," died at Springfield Hospital today of injuries received when he became wedged in the 5-ton cannon out of which he was being shot at the Eastern States Exposition Thursday. A coroner's inquest will be held to determine the cause of the accident.

At the time Ackenhausen was substituting for Capt. Wilhelm Wilno, originator of the human cannon-ball project, who was crippled while doing the stunt at Syracuse, N. Y., a few weeks ago.

Colorado Flier Killed As Airplane Crashes

VIRGINIA CAMPAIGN PUZZLES REGULARS

Republican Party Apparently Has Reversed Role in Old Dominion.

ANGELL IS NEW TYPE

Special to The Washington Post.

Richmond, Va., Sept. 21.—To the old-fashioned Virginian this campaign between the coalitionists and the regular Democrats is a most peculiar spectacle. It reveals reverse English, as it were.

Heretofore, the Republican party, which is, of course, an important element of the coalition, if not the most important, has been on the defense against the Democratic charge that it was the big brother of the rich, thinking only of the "malefactors of great wealth," to use a phrase popular with the late Theodore Roosevelt, to the detriment of the more humble citizens of the republic.

Now the situation is reversed. The coalition poses as the people's party. It professes to be the prospective savior of the rank and file of Virginians. It denounces the "perversion" of popular government, charging that the government at Richmond, through the short ballot and other reform measures, has been centered in the hands of a few politicians, who can run the state as they will. It thunders against "Du Pontism," which is interpreted to mean that great corporations have been attracted here through the lure of cheap labor. It promises to shatter the world of Virginia as it is and remold it nearer to the heart's desire of the plain man and woman, who have been robbed of their opportunities by an autocratic political organization.

An Odd Role to Play.

It is an odd role for the Republican party to play, but it is being played for all it is worth. Thomas Jefferson has become the patron saint of the party of Lincoln. His principles, the coalition says, have been perverted by a small band of self-seeking politicians, and they are being rescued in this campaign. Popular government will be restored in Virginia; the humble citizen will be handed back his rights, and the great corporations will be put in their place.

One of the most interesting figures of the campaign is Robert H. Angell, of Roanoke, chairman of the Republican party in the State. Angell is not a politician of the old school. He has been identified all his life with big business. The wiles of a Slemp are unknown to the Roanoker. He has not had the time to learn them. Angell is brutally frank. Being in the game to win, he proceeds to victory in a peculiar way. His plays present no camouflage. He lets the enemy in on all his secrets.

For example, Angell, in an authorized interview last week, declared frankly that the coalition could win only by sticking to the issues of the presidential campaign of last year. This means it must harp on "Tammanyism," "Raskobism," Catholicism and all the other "isms" which rose up in 1928 to plague the Virginia Democrats and sweep Virginia from its ancient political moorings. "Our boys can be depended upon," he said, "to penetrate the smokescree of State issues."

Angell's political strategy, apparently, is to throw into the fight every available gun—throw them in under the eyes of the enemy. Perhaps his idea is that a show of strength is worth all the under-cover measures. He does not believe that the battle should be won on clever, concealed movements.

Hits at Pollard Only.

Bascom Slemp would never have given out the statement authorized by Angell. He would not be averse to massing the forces of righteousness against the "Raskobites" and other vulnerable points in the enemy's line of defense, but he would have done it after the fashion of the old-time politician, covertly and without a hint of his intentions to his subordinates.

Nor does Angell believe in training his guns on "Byrdism." He thinks they should be directed at Pollard, and at Pollard only. He is willing to concede that Byrd has made a good governor, but he is unwilling to grant that Pollard, although he has embraced the policies of this administration, will be a worthy successor in the executive offices. His advice, therefore, is to go after Pollard, his record and his aims without reference to the fact that he is the anointed of Harry Byrd.

Dr. William Moseley Brown will be back on the hustings next Thursday at Roanoke, after a vacation of several days. Whether the rest was taken of his own volition, or at the urgent request of some of his advisors in the campaign, who, it is rumored, do not think his speeches have done the cause any good, is a point in issue among those on the outside.

During Dr. Brown's time off, Callom B. Jones, the candidate for lieutenant governor, has been bearing the brunt of the fight. Jones is a pleasing speaker of great experience in political fights, and is personally popular. He combines diplomacy with politics.

Democrats Avoid Predictions.

As the campaign progresses regular Democrats are less and less disposed to predict the size of the majority the party is expected to receive. They realize that a hard fight is ahead. No one discounts the influence that the circulation in Virginia of such a paper as the Challenge may have. Observers are inclined to think that it will be a powerful factor in stirring up the prejudices of last year.

In its vigorous advocacy of the renomination of Gov. Smith, it attempts to leave the impression that all those Democrats who supported him in 1928 will be in favor in 1932 of making him again the standard bearer. This may serve to alienate from the ticket many Democrats who have an abiding distrust of the New Yorker and all his works.

HAYNES WILL GIVE SELF UP, REPORT

Former Georgetown Banker to Surrender Tomorrow, Attorney Says.

$10,000 BAIL DEMANDED

Harry V. Haynes, former president of the Farmers & Mechanics National Bank of Georgetown, will surrender tomorrow at 10 o'clock to answer an indictment returned against him Friday by the District of Columbia grand jury, charging him with making false entries and misapplying and abstracting moneys, funds and credits of the bank in violation of the United States Attorney Leo A. Rover.

Notice that Haynes would surrender was communicated to Rover yesterday by the former banker's attorney, H. Winship Wheatley. Rover stated that he told Attorney Wheatley that he would demand a bond of $10,000, and that the lawyer said the sum was too large. Rover said, however, that he would insist on the $10,000 figure.

The United States marshall's office also is preparing to serve on Haynes at the time of his surrender copies of the suit filed against him several months ago by Mrs. Louis T. Chambers, in which an accounting of a sum of $140,000 is sought. Mrs. Chambers charged that the former banker had squandered and dissipated her entire capital.

The indictment found by the grand jury against Haynes contains eight counts and specifies that the former banker made false entries and misapplied funds totaling approximately $100,000.

This shortage in the funds of the bank is almost identical with that which is charged against George Willard Bennett, former teller of the institution. Bennett is now at liberty under $15,000 bond awaiting grand jury action on an embezzlement charge. The Government made no effort in the indictment against Haynes to connect him with Bennett's alleged peculations.

Lindbergh Arrives Ahead of Schedule

Flying Time of Two Laps Is Betterde on West Indian Course.

San Juan, Porto Rico, Sept 21 (A. P.) (By Pan-American Radio to Miami.). — Bettering his schedule by more than half an hour for the second time today, Col. Charles A. Lindbergh completed the second day of his 7,000-mile flight to extend the United States mail to Dutch Guiana when he landed here at 3:31 o'clock this afternoon.

Leaving Santo Domingo at 1:04 p. m., the flying colonel made the 250 air miles to San Juan in 2 hours 27 minutes, just 33 minutes under schedule. On his morning flight from Santiago de Cuba to Port au Prince he bettered the time for the 289-mile jaunt by 34 minutes against varying head winds.

A large welcome party was on hand to greet the plane when it swooped down to a perfect landing on the Pan-American Field at San Juan. Col. Lindbergh and his party will spend the night here and leave in the morning for their sweep around the Caribbean circle, following the Windward and Leeward Islands on his route to Paramaribo, Dutch Guiana.

Swears Neighbor Bewitched His Wif

Los Angeles Man Testifies to Spell on Home; Woman Sent to Hospital.

Los Angeles, Sept. 21.—That there are many people living right here in Los Angeles who believe in witches, who tie ropes around their homes and use other charms to protect themselves and who are preyed upon by witch doctors who charge as much as $100 for treatments, was revealed in the Psychopathic Court at a hearing on the sanity of Mrs. Concha Pedgredon, 35 years of age.

During the hearing the husband, Jose Pedgredon, and other members of the family insisted the patient was not insane, but bewitched by a woman who lives close to the Pedgredon home, physicians, however, testified she was suffering from dementia praecox, after which Presiding Superior Judge Gould ordered Mrs. Pedgredon sent to the State Hospital for treatment.

Relative of the patient were sincere in their belief that Mrs. Pedgredon was bewitched by a neighbor whose machinations, they said, had brought disaster not only to the mother of the household, but also to two sons.

They also, according to their testimony, had consulted a witch doctor who would have broken the spell on Mrs. Pedgredon for a $100 fee. In their own efforts they had tied a rope around the house and used other charms to drive the witches away.

SCHOOL BELLS CALL 72,000 TOMORROW

HINE MAKES AN ADDRESS

The clang of school bells will echo throughout the Capital tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock, sounding the beginning of another year.

Doors of 175 school buildings will be thrown open, prepared to receive approximately 72,000 pupils. School officials announced yesterday that the 2,700 District school teachers, as a result of recent conferences with Dr. Frank W. Ballou, superintendent of schools, and his aids, have made all last-minute preparations.

An address on "The Public Schools Look Forward," explaining the preparations and the local school system, was given by Harry O. Hine, secretary of the Board of Education, last night over radio Station WMAL. The address was one of a series of radio talks prepared by the Washington Chamber of Commerce dealing with civic and business interests of the Capital.

57,000 in Elementary Classes.

"Foremost in public interest to the parents is the larger group in the elementary schools, numbering about 57,000," Mr. Hine declared. "This list includes the kindergarten tots, who are admitted at 5 years of age, who will come with wondering eyes to their first experience with school, where education starts by directed play, music, games and marches. The junior high schools, with pupils of the seventh, eighth and ninth grades, and the senior high schools will enroll about 15,000. The trade schools are demonstrating their worth by increased enrollments. Nearly a thousand will seek instruction in the normal schools."

Mr. Hine explained that parents seeking to enroll their children in elementary schools should go to the school nearest their homes, where the principal will handle the enrollment. Students coming into the junior and senior high school systems from private, parish schools and from outside the District, Mr. Hine explained, should enroll at the Franklin Administration Building, Thirteenth and K streets northwest.

Portable Schools Safe.

"There have been some disquieting articles in the newspapers concerning portable schools, which still remain as a thorn in the flesh," Mr. Hine declared. "The most careful examination has been made and some condemned. All that remain in use will be absolutely safe. They can not be discharded while 186 classes remain under half-time instruction for lack of sufficient better accommodations."

To relieve the congested situation, Mr. Hine stated, four new elementary schools are now nearing completion, while ten others have additions or assembly halls under construction.

Mr. Hine also spoke about the new extension of hours from 230 o'clock until 3 o'clock in the senior high schools, the care being taken by the District of transporting invalid children to schools in the suburbs and making them comfortable in classrooms, and preparations being made for the opening of night schools on October 1.

2,238 MATRICULATE IN U. OF VA. SCHOOLS

Enrollment Exceeds That of Last Years Despite Higher Entrance Requirements.

MAY REACH OVER 2,400

Special to The Washington Post.

Charlottesville, Va., Sept. 21.—Enrollment at the University of Virginia for the session of 1929-1930 has passed all previous years. When final figures for registration are in, the total will probably be past 2,400 and it may reach 2,500.

At the close of the first week after registration started, a total of 2,238 had matriculated. This is far ahead of the 2,196 who registered last session and surpasses the 2,196 which was the final figure for 1927-28, the highest previous registration.

According to Miss Virginia Moran, registrar, the figures for all departments are: The college, 1,281; law, 265; medicine, 232; engineering, 179; graduate studies, 164, and education, 97.

On the same days last year the totals were: College, 1,096; law, 156; medicine, 235; engineering, 151; graduate studies, 118, and education, 97. There have been increases in all departments except in education and in medicine, where the number is strictly limited.

Three days are allowed for registration. It is usual that after this period a few over 400 late arrivals matriculate, most of them before October 1. This session the total at the close of registration was 2,059. If there is a proportionate increase, the final figure for the year will be nearly 2,500.

The increase in enrollment has been despite the fact that the entrance requirements of the university have been made much more rigid during recent sessions. A larger number of applicants for admission were turned away this year than ever before.

Women in all departments number 109. This is about the same number that registered during the first week last year.

HOT DEBATE MARKS LEAGUE DISCUSSION limitation of land forces by general conferences.

Norway's proposal at the opening of the present assembly session for establishing an intimate connection between the proposed international reparations bank and the League of Nations met formidable opposition in the committee on technical organizations.

Allied with Norway in this movement were Denmark, Poland and Austria, who argued that the purpose of the league in the economic field is identical with the purpose of the bank and that all countries have a deep interest in the bank's program, as well as those who receive reparations.

But France, Great Britain and Belgium, the countries chiefly concerned with reparations, and Japan declared themselves against the Norwgeian scheme.

Louis Loucheur, French cabinet minister and spokesman for the group on this question, disclosed the fact that he had the United States in mind. He warned delegates that by an inopportune intervention they might frighten away those who had decided to support the creation of the bank, "including a great country not represented here which is deeply interested."

The Chinese proposal for examining the possibility of revising "inapplicable treaties," after occupying several sittings of a subcommittee was still tonight before that body.

The assembly held plenary sessions this afternoon and tonight in order to push forward routine business so as to reach a final adjournment by Wednesday night.

The delegates adopted committee reports on Armenian refugees, on intellectual cooperation and on the work of the league's health organization.

CAPT. C. C. CALHOUN AND WIFE ARE SUED

THEFT CHARGED, CLAIM

Capt. Clarence C. Calhoun and his wife, Mrs. Cornelia Daisy B. Calhoun, were named defendants in four suits filed yesterday in District Supreme Court and the Circuit Court of Montgomery County, Md., at Rockville, by George A. Gormley, of 4319 River road northwest, Washington, in which damages aggregating $200,000 are sought for alleged slander.

Two suits were filed against the Calhouns in the District Supreme Court and two in the Maryland Circuit Court, one suit in each jurisdiction being directed against the husband and one in each against the wife. Damages of $50,000 are sought in each suit.

Declarations were filed in connection with the institution of the suits in the District, but in the Maryland suits, Attorneys Palmer, Davis and Scott and William J. Neale, merely filed suits by titling. This is in accordance with Maryland law. The declarations will be filed some time before November 1. In the District suits, the language in each declaration is identical.

Trials in Rockville First.

The suits filed in Rockville, it is understood, will be calendared for trial at the spring term of the court, while, due to the congested docket of the District Supreme Court, the suits filed here probably will not be reached before the October term of 1930.

All four suits are an aftermath of the suit for injunction filed in District Supreme Court last Thursday by Mrs. Calhoun, in which she seeks the return of a $2,000 note which she alleges that Gormley carried off from her palatial home in Chevy Chase, Md., without giving her money. The suit filed by Mrs. Calhoun was against Gormley and Joseph R. Harris, who is suing her and Gormley in Montgomery County on the note.

Gormley, in his actions filed in the District Supreme Court, alleges that on July 25, 1928, Mrs. Calhoun was indebted to him in the sum of $2,000 and that she delivered to him a promissory note for $2,000 in full payment and satisfaction of the obligation. Gormley explains that he is a building contractor and that in the course of his business he is compelled to borrow money himself. One of the persons from whom he borrowed money, he enumerates as Joseph R. Harris, specifying that he was indebted to him in the sum of $845. In order to satisfy that obligation, he sets out, he turned Mrs. Calhoun's note over to Harris.

Theft Charged, Gormley Says.

Gormley alleges that the Calhouns told Harris that he had stolen the note from Mrs. Calhoun's desk.

The plaintiff asserts that he has always been an honorable man and that utterance of the alleged slander has injured him in his good name, fame, repute and credit.

Capt. and Mrs. Calhoun are among the most notable of Washington's socially prominent personages. They entertained the Prince of Wales on the occasion of his visit to Washington, and have been hosts to other

Both Capt. and Mrs. Calhoun recently caused the arrest of W. Clark Noble, internationally known sculptor, his wife and three others on a charge of conspiracy to blackmail. An indictment was returned against the quintet on Friday. The indictment specifies that the Calhouns were threatened with the exposure of a scandal unless they gave the alleged conspirators $100,000.

Salvation Army Here Aims to Be Model

Salvation Army service in Washington offers the opportunity of being made a model to the many branches of the organization throughout the country, Maj. James Asher, division commander in charge of the Washington office, told employes of the Community Chest in a talk last week.

Maj. Asher said that this goal could be easily gained through the connection of the Salvation Army with the Community Chest in the "model city" of the country. Figures cited by Maj. Asher revealed that the Salvation Army operates in 83 different countries and colonies; that its officers preach the gospel in 67 different languages and that the army has 2,000 commissioned officers, who operate in 16,000 different centers.

WESTERNERS FORM AN ANTITARIFF BODY

Twelve Republicans Perfect Organization to Tax Only Farm Products.

SENATE TO MEET EARLIER

(Associated Press.)

Coincident with a decision by the Senate yesterday to meet an hour earlier Monday to speed action on the tariff bill, a group of twelve Western Republicans perfected an organization aimed to eliminate the proposed industrial rate increases and to confine the revision to agricultural products.

Headed by Senator Borah, of Idaho, the independent group assessed its strength at fourteen, a number which it feels will give the organization hte balance of power as between the Democrats and Republican regulars in the tariff controversy.

The group also is expected to stand as a unit against the flexible provision granting the President power to raise or lower customs duties.

Restore Existing Law.

These provisions are liberalized in the pending bill. While the finance committee Republicans have decided to eliminate the proposed amendment and virtually restore existing law, many senators favor complete repeal of the clause with Congress given exclusive power to change rates.

Those attending today's independent gathering were Senators Borah, Norris, Howell, McMaster, La Follette, Blaine, Nye, Frazier, Brookhart, Cutting, Schall and Pine. It was the first time Senators Cutting, of New Mexico, and Pine, of Oklahoma, had entered the group's meetings.

Shipstead to Aid.

The votes of Senators Shipstead (Farmer-Labor), Minnesota, and Norbeck (Republican), South Dakota, are counted on by the farm bloc.

Developments in the Senate touching upon the silence of President Hoover in the tariff controversy brought the official assertion today that the Executive adhered to the tariff ideas expressed in his message to the special session, which proposed a limited revision confined primarily to agriculture, but extending also to suffering manufacturing industries.

The request that the Senate convene at 11 o'clock Monday instead of noon was presented by Senator Watson, of Indiana, the Republican leader, who said it applied only to that day. A similar motion would have to be approved, he said, if the longer day was to be made permanent.

Night Sessions Opposed.

Democrats and Republican independents, while not objecting to the request, served notice that they would not approve of holding the Senate later than 6 o'clock in the evening, as they wanted ample time to prepare for debate. Senator Watson assured them that there was no present intention to hold night sessions, although no tariff measure ever had been passed without them.

Blaine said that while he would not seek unduly to delay the measure, he and others were prepared to protest any attempt to "grind down the physical endurance of members" and to debate "to the extent that the measure shall not pass until full opportunity is given to consider its provisions, even at the expense of being charged with filibustering."

There were times, he added, when filibusters were necessary to let the Senate know there were members who did not propos to be "hog-tied."

Senator Simmons, of North Carolina, ranking Democrat on the finance committee, also warned the Republicans that ample time should be allowed to prepare for debate. He and Senator Harrison, of Mississippi, another minority member of the committee, complimented the Republicans for the "courtesy" they have shown thus far.

Robbers Fail to Open Supply Company Safe

An unsuccessful attempt to rob the safe of the Penn Building Supply Co., 1239 Twenty-fourth street northwest, was made sometime Friday night or yesterday morning, according to a report made to the police by William E. Benton, manager of the company.

Entrance was gained by breaking a glass in a side window, Benton reported, and the place was ransacked, although nothing was missing. The hinges on the door on the office safe had been removed, but the intruder was unable to get it open.

ALLEN SUMMONED BEFORE GRAND JURY

was found with a pajama cord knotted around her neck as a garrott. Allen's contention is that Mrs. McPherson could not have tied the cord as securely as it was fastened.

Allen last night voiced his protest against an investigation into the mysterious case by the District grand jury.

"You can make a jury believe anything when there is no opposition," Allen declared.

Assistant District Attorney Collins has gone on record a s saying the nurse committed suicide. Allen declared, and added that Collins is "pretty thick" with Lieut. dward J. Kelly, commander of the homicide squad, whose investigation into the death resulted in a verdict of suicide being returned by a coroner's jury.

Allen pointed out his objections to the grand jury investigation was not intended as a reflection upon that body. He stated that in his opinion such an investigation should be conducted in public and not "behind closed doors," as is the procedure with grand jury inquiries.

"I am positive that if the facts I have dug up in this case were presented to an impartial body, in an impartial manner, a verdic tof murder would be the result," Allen stated. "It seems that it has now come to a point of me against the Police Department, and I know I can make good."

Allen conducted a private investigation into the case while his comrades of the Third Precinct and members of the homicide squad were also investigating. As a result of his utterances against his superior officers and being late for duty because of his investigation, Allen will be haled before the Police Trial Board on charges of conduct unbecoming an officer.

The patrolman, who first gained prominence in the Capital more than a year ago when he accused fellow policemen of brutally treating prisoners, claims that it was impossible for Mrs. McPherson to kill herself.

"I called up Assistant District Attorney Collins last week," Allen said, "and told him I had the goods to show Mrs. McPherson was murdered, and did not commit suicide. I made an appointment with him and, after he showed up two hours late, I told him a little of what I had uncovered. The next thing I knew, Collins was in the office of Lieut. Kelly at headquarters, and I feel certain he was giving away what I had told him to Kelly. I called Collins on the telephone and told him I knew he was with Kelly and his answer was to hang up the receiver on me."

The convention will continue through the following Thursday. More than 100 delegates from 20 States already have been registered at the headquarters of the National Council, 1312 Massachusetts avenue, and about 400 delegates, representing 30 States, are expected to attend the convention.

Parole Is Asked on Ground That He Has Been Punished Enough.

PROMISES TO QUIT CITY

Philadelphia, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Alphonse "Scarface Al" Capone, Chicago gangland leader, apparently believes that if at first you don't succeed try, try again.

Through his Philadelphia lawyers, Capone today started another proceeding to have himself released from the Eastern State penitentiary where he and his bodyguard, Frank Cline, also of Chicago, are serving a one-year sentence for carrying a loaded pistol in Philadelphia. Cline is included in the proceedings.

Capone wants to be paroled and gives as the reason that he has been punished enough. If freed from the penitentiary, he promises to get out of Philadelphia as quickly as he can.

Arrested May 17.

Al and his pal were picked up here by two detectives on the night of May 17 as they were leaving a motion picture house. They were given a midnight hearing and held in $30,000 bail each so as to make it difficult for them to find bondsmen before their case could go to the grand jury the next morning. The jury promptly indicted them and the case was rushed before Judge John E. Walsh in municipal court. They admitted they had loaded guns and were given the maximum sentence of one year. In less than an hour they were behind the prison bars serving their term.

Some time ago counsel for Capone tried to have the case reviewed, but failed. The lawyers said they would take an appeal to the State Superior Court but this tribunal was not to meet until October.

Were on Way to Chicago.

The petition for the parole states that Capone and Cline were on their way from Atlantic City to Chicago and between trains here attended the movie. When they left to go to the train the detectives grabbed them.

"Your petitioner further avers," says the appeal for parole, "that the sentence so imposed has had a most salutory effect and that in his opinion the prisoner has been sufficiently punished, and if your honorable court sees fit to grant the parole your petitioner's client will leave the jurisdiction for his own home."

Hearing on the petition will be heard by Judge Walsh October 4.

STEEL MAGNATE REVEALS WISH TO DO AWAY WITH ALL NAVIES

Robinson Rattles the Bones.

"The Bethlehem Steel Corporation was involved in litigation with the Shipping Board?" asked the senator. "There was some fraud involved?"

"That has all been thrashed out and gone over in the newspapers long ago," replied Schwab. "It has no relation to this investigation."

It must have been that the senator thought that if he did not interject like this, Schwab, Grace and the steel corporation would take on angelic form and float away right there before the committee's eyes.

Because Schwab, recalling his previous utterances on world peace, kept asserting that the Bethlehem firm would gladly make any sacrifice.

"We were glad to be able to serve our country during the war in the manufacture of ordnance," he declared. "Now we are glad to give up that work. All of our ordnance plants have been dismantled. It is the most unsatisfactory branch of our business."

Busy on Ship Repairs.

Its shipbuilding branch, the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Co., is now largely confined to ship repairs, he insisted.

"Personally, I wish this country never has to spend another cent on naval or military armaments," declared Grace. "As a business man, I have no interest in this matter."

Grace, a spare man with brownish gray, thinning hair, has largely succeeded Schwab to the steel throne. He is president of the Bethlehem corporation which now appears to have gotten its name from the star of that name. Schwab is chairman of the board.

"I have just concluded 50 years of service to the steel companies," he said, "and I rely upon Mr. Grace to run the business. I regard him as my boy, although he is no longer a boy."

The fact that Shearer was in the employ of the Bethlehem, that is, the shipbuilding subsidiary, came first to his knowledge two years ago, Schwab said. Grace told him about it, Grace having learned it, Grace testified, after two newspapermen had brought it to his attention at two different times. When the first newspaper man asked him about it, Grace said, he had told him that the report was "ridiculous and absurd," but he checked up when he heard the report again.

An "Unwise" Move.

S. W. Wakeman, in charge of eastern shipbuilding operations, represented Bethlehem in the three party agreement to employ Shearer, both Schwab and Grace testified, and they both agreed that Wakeman had been very "unwise."

Senator Shortridge wanted to know why it had all been so "unwise." If what the shipbuilders say is true, that everything was on the level, that Shearer was sent to Geneva simply as an observer.

"Well, it let us in for all of this," Grace replied very frankly, adding that Bethlehem had always sought to steer clear of anything approaching interference with the Government's international relations.

It was Robinson's effort to learn from Schwab why he could not have his idealistic policies carried out in his organization that resulted in a right warm set-to between the two men.

Mutual Lecturing.

Robinson had raised his voice and asked Schwab to answer him briefly without going into patriotic discussions.

"Are we to do this or are we to proceed in a friendly and gentlemanly manner?" asked Schwab, himself showing a little heat, as much as a man as well mannered as Schwab could show, in fact.

"You are going to answer my questions," retorted Robinson. "Please refrain from lecturing me about the nature of my questions."

"Likewise," rejoined Schwab.

Half of Disabled Veterans Are Jobless

After conducting a broad survey of the problem, the Disabled American Veterans organization of Washington declares that veterans undergoing hospital treatment are about the only ones in their ranks who are unemployed.

According to figures based upon replies to the questionnaire, the organization states that 46 per cent of its members are now employed and the remaining 54 per cent unemployed. Only one-half of 1 per cent of those replying are in business for themselves, while 69 per cent indicate they are not satisfied with their employment.

Maryland Avenue Property Padlocked

Justice Wendell P. Stafford, in District Supreme Court, yesterday signed a temporary padlock injunction directed against Russell Murray, Jane Enke, Jeanette W. Hulse and the premises at 496 Maryland avenue southwest.

Murray and the Enke woman are named as operators of a business at the address, while the Hulse woman is named as owner of the property. The Government's petition for injunction was filed by United States Attorney Leo A. Rover and Assistant United States Attorney John B. Williams. In connection with the filing of the petition, Williams announced that it was the first time two padlock injunctions had been sought in the District of Columbia in one week. The first injunction was obtained against the premises at 1126 Seventh street northwest.

After got a dollar and apparently can expect no more. He parted with the securities and Rosen before he entered a Fourteenth street movie house yesterday afternoon. In his confession the boy said Rosen had met him on the street after he left the Hiscoe offices en route to a bank with a certified check which redeemed the securities, posted as collateral on a loan.

"He said to me he needed money and that I should walk off with the loan," the boy asserted, "and he then told me that my father was to receive $50,000 as my share. Then I finally consented."

Cubans Cheer Decline In American Drinking

Havana, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Cubans, except bartenders and cafe owners, are hailing with satisfaction decreased drinking by American visitors and a coincidental increased nterest in observation of Cuba without the blurred, roseate hues induced by "daiquires" or other similarly potent mixtures.

North American brothers—and sisters—are doing less drinking, according to "mixers" at various leading hotels here. It is not without a sigh that such an assertion is made but the sigh of the barkeep is echoed by a resounding cheer from the many Cubans who would have the tourists see more of the outdoor land and less of the well decorated lounge rooms and bars.

Brazil Seeks World Market for Oranges

Rio Janeiro, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Machinery from California and Florida, which attractively packs oranges for shipment with a minimum of human handling, is being introduced here as part of Brazil's effort to win a world market for her oranges, especially in Europe.

The shorter haul from Rio, as compared with the distance from the orange country of the United States, is a natural help to Brazilian growers and they have the further advantage of being able to ship at all seasons.

MANCHURIA BORDER FIGHTING CONTINUES

Chinese Railway Continues Active While Soviets Wait New Move.

WHITE GUARDS ROUTED

Moscow, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Desultory fighting continues along the Russo-Chinese borders in Manchuria, and in the meantime the great strategic Eastern Railway, linking the Soviet Union with the Far East, is all but idle.

While Moscow is waiting for the next move from the Nanking diplomates in the long dispute over the control and operation of the road, Chinese troops, supported by White Rusian irregulars, continue guerrila warfare in the areas where the Chinese part of the line joins with the Russian.

Within the last 48 hours four such attacks were reported. In the village of Abagateusvsky Chinese soldiers kept up continuous fire on Rusian automobile transports until they were driven off.

At Pogranichnaya Chinese attacked Soviet frontier guards with rifle and machine gun fire. According to a Khabarovsk dispatch, Chinese military authorities in Moshan District, 15 miles west of Lake Hanka, have formed a large, well-armed band of White Guards for a surprise attack on Russian soil. The dispatch added that Red army forces had taken measures to prevent the raid.

A telegram from Vladivostock said White Guard raiders, who had been making incursions into Soviet territory since September 11, were beaten off yesterday and some of them captured. These testified that the band was organized at Harbin by a Russian general on structions from Manchurian authorities. Most of the members were former czarist officers. They were said to have orders from Chinese military authorities to cross the frontier to rob and kill the people in Soviet villages.

LAYMEN TO BE PRESENT

Special to The Washington Post.

Harrisonburg, Va., Sept. 21.—After preaching the farewell sermons of the church year Sunday, twoscore Shenandoah Valley Methodist and United Brethren ministers will depart for annual conferences next week—the Methodists at Cumberland, Md., and the United Brethren at Keyser, W. Va.

Each minister will be accompanied by his group of lay delegates to the respective conferences and those church members left at home will keep in touch with the proceedings especially the appointment of pastors for the coming year through the papers.

The Virginia Conference of the United Brethren Church opens at Keyser next Thursday, to continue through the following Monday. This gathering will attract delegates from all the churches in Virginia and the portions of West Virginia and Maryland embraced by the conference, with a membership of 20,000. The 113th session of the conference will be outstanding from the fact that it will be the first to be presided over by its new bishop, Dr. G. W. Batsdorf, of Dayton, Ohio, who was elected at the general conference last summer to succeed the Rev. William Bell, of Harrisburg, Pa., retired. Dr. J. H. Brunk, of Martinsburg, is the superintendent of the Virginia United Brethren Conference.

MEDICINAL LIQUOR FLAYED TO W.C.T.U.

Union Pledges Continuanec of Law Enforcement Work of Hoover.

TABLET TO BE UNVEILED

Indianapolis, Ind., Sept. 21 (A.P.). Having pledged to President Hoover today continuance of their efforts to promote law observance, delegates to the fifty-fifth annual convention of the national Woman's Christian Temperance Union were prepared to pay tribute to Miss Frances E. Willard, who was elected national president here 50 years ago. A memorial tablet to Miss Willard will be unveiled in the rotunda of the Indiana State Capitol tomorrow afternoon.

The W. C. T. U., in its telegram to Hoover, also pledged "active support of our organization in making known the truth about the benefits of prohibition by the systematic distribution of literature, by public meetings and by rallying the citizenship to the support of the Government in every effort to make effective the will of the people as expressed in the eighteenth amendment.

President Hoover's message to the convention yesterday said he was "impressed with the great need for extended work of education in the moral, physical and economic benefits of temperance" and that too many persons "rely wholly upon the strong arm of law to enforce abstinence."

Mrs. Ela Boole, of Brooklyn, N. Y., W. C. T. U. national president, will present the bronz plaque of Miss Willard, designed by Lorado Taft, Cicago sculptor, to the State of Indiana.

Tonight's meeting was reserved for the finals of a national oratorical contest sponsored by the W. C. T. U. Harold Netherton, Oklahoma; Effie Bowen, New Jersey; Phyllis Lenore Young, Illinois; Helen Nicholas, Pennsylvania; Helen H. Shulke, Ohio, and Emmanuel H. Baugh, Indiana, were to speak, the winner being presented a diamond medal by United States Senator Arthur R. Robinson, of Indiana.

"There is absolutely no need for whisky in the treatment of any disease, at any age, in any climate," Dr. M. Len Hutchins, of Los Angeles, director of the department of medical temperance, told the convention. She said prescription of alcoholic beverages as "household remedies" was a fraud and has caused thousands to become liquor addicts.

Lieutenant of Marines Injured by Taxicab

Lieut. Raymond Christ, jr., 21 years old, attached to the Marine Barracks at Philadelphia, Pa., was bruised about the hands and knees yesterday afternoon when struck down by a taxicab while stepping from a street car loading platform at Fourteenth and F streets northwest.

Christ was taken to Emergency Hospital by Joseph L. Causey, of 1135 Morse street northeast, operator of the machine that struck him, and treated by Dr. C. B. White. His injuries were said not to be serious.

Mrs. Kebler has perhaps established a record of service in the department as community secretary. Miss Burklin will return to the department following a year's absence from the work.

Hens Break Record In Laying Contest

Special to The Washington Post.

College Park, Md., Sept. 21.—The 1,000 hens competing for honors in egg production in the fourth annual egg-laying contest being conducted by the University of Maryland Experiment Station continue to increase their margin over the records made by the birds competing in the previous contests and seem destined to strike of fan average individual production of around 200 eggs.

In the 1927-28 contest a total for the 52 weeks of 191.3 eggs for each hen was laid. As the present group has their average to 187.2 and still have six weeks to go before the finish line is reached, it can be readily seen that the chances are good for pushing the score over the even 200 mark.

High hen clipped off a perfect score for the week to run her total to 287 eggs. This is hen No. 81 in the pen of W. S. Hannah & Son, Grand Rapids, Mich.

The schools can be seen from planes as dark spots in the water or as glistening masses when they come near the surface.

LONE SIBERIA TOWN SAW GRAF ZEPPELIN

HOME OF CZAR'S EXILES

In its flight of more than 3,000 miles from the Ural Mountains across Asia, the Graf Zeppelin sighted only one sizable town. That was Yakutsk, on the banks of the Lena River, barely 300 miles south of the Arctic Circle. A bulletin from the National Geographic Society deals with this isolated metropolis of Northeastern Siberia.

"Yakutsk is one of the northernmost towns of the world," says the bulletin, "ranking in this respect with Nome, Alaska; Trondhjem, Norway, and Archangel, in European Russia. Some of these competitors are actually closer to the North Pole than Yakutsk, but the latter undoubtedly takes first honors in the coldness of its climate. The mean temperature for January is 46 degrees Fahrenheit below zero, while the mean for July is only 66 degrees Fahrenheit above zero, a temperature which in the United States means chilly autumn weather.

Nearest Railroad 600 Miles.

"If one travels to Yakutsk other than by dirigible, he must negotiate a long and arduous journey. The nearest railroad, the Amur River branch of the Transsiberian Railway, lies 600 miles south of Yakutsk, across almost impassable mountains. Even higher mountains, those of the Stanovoi Range, which the Zeppelin had great difficulty in crossing, lie between Yakutsk and the Pacific Coast, 300 miles to the east. The natural outlet of the region is the Lena River, which, however, flows northward into the Arctic Ocean, where ice conditions usually interfere with navigation. The most traveled route connecting Yakutsk with the rest of the world lies up the Lena River and over the mountains near its headquarters to Irkutsk, on the Transsiberian Railway, near Lake Baikal. This road is more than 1,500 miles long and it requires from 25 to 30 days to traverse it.

"Since the building of the transsiberian Railway, Yakutsk has been left far to the north of the beaten path across Siberia. Strangely enough, however, this far northern town was one of the principal bases of operation when the Russians were extending their control eastward into Asia. This was because the geography of the country made it easier for the pioneer Cossacks to travel along the great streams of the north and their tributaries. In this way the head waters of the Lena were reached and that river was followed eastward. A fort was built at Yakutsk in 1632 on the right bank of the Lena, and the town was moved across the river in 1640. At that time the Amur Valley, which has played such an important part in Russian affairs, had not been dicovered by the pioneers. With Yakutsk as a base, adventurous bands of Cossacks went southeastward between 1643 and 1650 and began the conquest of the Amur Valley, which is to be the real path for Russia in the Far East.

Place of Exile.

"From the seventeenth century on Yakutsk was used as a place of exile for Russians who had incurred the Czar's displeasure and for Poles and other war captives. Later hundreds of religious sectarians whose tenets were not acceptable to the orthodox church were sent to Yakutsk to join the political exiles. Several thriving and prosperous villages near the city are maintained by the colonies of Skoptz, fanatics whose aim is to subdue all things physical to the spirit.

"Since 1920 Yakutsk has been the capital of the Soviet state of Yakutia, which goes by the official name of the Yakutian Autonomous Soviet Socialistic Republic. The city now has a population of about 10,000, of which about half are Russians. The remainder are Yakuts and members of other Siberian tribes. The Russian Orthodox Cathedral is the dominant building of the city. Practically all of the other structures are low and are built of wood. The chief activity of the city is as a market for the thousands of furs that are brought in from the marshes and forests that extend in every direction."

Bear Versatile Thief; Raids Garden, Kennel

Duluth, Sept. 21.—The nocturnal promenades of a huge black bear, which exhibits versatility and voraciousness in raiding berry bushes, a dog's bone pile; a chicken coop and a garden, have stimulated vigilance on the part of residents living on Vassar street, in the Woodland district.

One night bruin broke down a fence inclosing a pen where Oliver Olson keeps his blooded dogs, stole a pile of bones left for them, and, before he left, drank all the water in the dogs' trough. He also raided the berry patch of Henry Hagen, causing much damage.

The next night Mr. Olson was compelled to fire two shots at the bear to rout the beast from his chicken coop. He has been seen by both Mr. Olson and Mr. Hagen, who say that he is unusually large.

Real Flying Parsons At Work in Oklahoma

Enid, Okla., Sept. 21.—Preachers may drop into a score of communities from "heaven" soon if plans of Dr. I. N. McCash, president of Phillips University here, are carried out. For years student ministers of Phillips have occupied numerous pulpits over the State over the weekend. Phillips has school Saturday and no classes Monday in order to permit the student preachers to return after their night sermons.

Dr. McCash now has the idea of "dropping" the preachers from airplanes in Oklahoma, Texas, Kansas, Missouri and Arkansas. It would enable the university to broaden its scope, he says, and he firmly believes the time will come when there will be many "flying parsons."

FORMER AMERICAN EMBASSY RAZED

Famous Dorchester House in London to Give Place to Hotel.

KING EDWARD WAS GUEST

London, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Tragedy is stalking through the empty halls of Dorchester House, one of the few remaining bits of Americana in London representative of the stately Edwardian era.

It is the tragedy of the house wrecker and the sadness of lavender and old lace rudely disturbed. A hotel is to be erected on the site.

The famous marble balustrades, caressed by the pink and white fingers of the loveliest women in the empire in the days when Dorchester House was the American Embassy, presided over by Joseph H. Choate and Whitelaw Reid, are smudged with the hands of toiling workmen.

Receptions by Reids.

The other day, in a room where Titians, Murilos, Velasquez and Tintorettos used to look down on the political dinner parties and the royal receptions which the Whitelaw Reids gave from 1906 until King Edward's death, the hammer of the auctioneer sounded, realizing a few guineas for objects of art which cost thousands.

The great marble staircase, trodden by the feet of princes and kings, diplomats and society beauties, was sold in three sections. It brought only $1,250, although in 1851 when the mansion was built, it cost $150,000.

Whitelaw Reid was not in Dorchester House many months before the Balfour government fell. It was a time of intense political excitement in England, and Park lane, on which Dorchester House is situated, was the center of it.

King Edward came frequently. When Theodore Roosevelt came over as special ambassador at the time of his majesty's death, he and Mrs. Roosevelt and three of their children stopped in Dorchester House.

Browsed Among Books.

Joseph H. Choate, the immediate predecessor of Mr. Reid, loved to browse through the old books of Dorchester House library. Other browsers included Alfred Austin, Mark Twain, Rudyard Kipling, Andrew Carnegie, William J. Bryan and Alma Tadema.

The mansion with its 40 bedrooms was built by Robert Stayner Holford, who was born seven years before Waterloo and made a fortune out of shares in the New River Co. and from bullion buried by a relative on the Isle of Wight in the days when Napoleon was threatening invasion.

Holford called in Lewis Vulliamy, the architect, Alfred Stevens, the sculptor; Aglinatti, the painter, and Sir Coutts Lindsay, the man of art. Their combined genius created Dorchester House which covered 80,000 square feet of ground.

Cheese Rollers in Jail; Police Take No Chances

San Francisco, Sept. 1.—Two San Francisco policemen had never seen a professional cheese roller in action before, and as a result they captured two would-be thieves.

Corpl. John Reed noticed a large cheese rolling slowly down one of San Francisco's 33 hills and behind it a furtive-appearing character guiding its process with a stick.

Corpl. Reed took charge of the cheese's progress and guided it—as well as its previous master—to the city jail. The would-be thief confessed, but would not tell where he got the cheese.

Just as the thief was about to be locked up in rolled another cheese, and behind it came another policeman and another would-be thief.

The story just had to come out then. There was a big shipment of cheeses at Pier 19 and some of the boys just couldn't resist the temptation of rolling them away.

KING JAMES I GRACIOUSLY GRANTED . . .

John Stow, England's renowned historian, having spent forty-five years in getting material and writing his famous "Survey of England" was, as a recompense for his literary genius and labors, in 1604, in his eightieth year, "graciously granted" by King James I, permission to beg—without having his ears cut off, which was the customary penalty for soliciting alms without being duly licensed. Stow only received seven and a half six pence in one whole parish in answer to his call for charity.

The way to be able to look an approaching old age in the face is to budget your income in your productive years, and save a part of it. You can not begin saving if you are in debt. If debt is one of your worries consolidate all your debts and pay them off with the proceeds of a Morris Plan loan, which in turn may be liquidated by you through the means of small easy monthly deposits.

SERTG. YORK'S FEAT EXHIBITION FEATURE

Epic Exploit of World War to Be Depicted in Army Maneuvers Here.

VARIOUS OTHER EVENTS

Sergt. Alvin C. York, whom Gen. Pershing eulogized as "the outstanding civilian soldier of the World War," is going to be in Washington October 3, 4 and 5, as the guest of the Army at the annual military exposition and carnival.

Sergt. York will be an interested spectator of a show that has never before been attempted and that is to portray to the American public how he accomplished his marvelous performance of whipping an entire enemy machine gun battalion, killing 29 men, capturing 36 machine guns and bringing in to the American line, 132 prisoners, four of them officers.

This is only one of the incidents of the great sham battle, "Smashing Through the Argonne with Sergeant York," that the Army will stage afternoon and evening at its big show on the grounds of the Army War College.

York's Exploit to Be Shown.

The scenario of the action is taken from one of the signal triumphs of American arms in the Great War, the advance of the Eighty-Second Division in the Argonne forest. During this engagement occurred the magnificent feat of Sergt. York, one that always will be retold in the military tradition of this country. It is entitled to a place among the famous deeds of arms of legendary and modern warfare.

Trained United States Army regulars from the Twelfth Infantry at Fort Washington have been rehearsing for this battle. Tanks are coming from Fort Meade. The Air Force at Bolling Field and other flying fields of the Army along the Eastern coast also will take part in the sham battle, as well as the Field Artillery from Fort Monroe. All wi have their parts in this masterpiece of reproduction of the famous action of the Word War.

Army officers in charge of this feature of the military show, say it will be the most stirring sham battle that the Army has ever produced. Every branch of the service is on its mettle to outstrip each other in performance in the show, for it will be conducted under the eyes of the ranking officers of the Army, military attaches from foreign countries, high officials of the Government, and invited guests who are journeying from many parts of the country to see this greatest of all military expositions.

Horsemanship to Be Exhibited.

While the sham battle and reproduction of Sergt. York's thrilling and audacious feat is the major event on the program, which goes on every afternoon and evening of the three days of the show, other features include: Daring feats of horsemanship by the crack, roughriding Machine Gun Troop of the Third Cavalry of Fort Myer. The famous Black Horse Battery and the equally renowned White Horse Battery of the Sixteenth Field Artillery will perform stirring evolutions in combat exercises. The aces of Uncle Sam's military air force, gathered from Bolling Field and the various flying stations on the Eastern Coast, will perform every aerial stunt in the repertoire of present-day aviation, including battle in the air, with planes coming down in flames and other hair-raising feats that the crack fliers of the Army are so expert in performing; huge elephantine Army tanks, which used to plod slowly over the earth, are now engines of speed as well as strength and will demonstrate these new incorporated qualities before the eyes of the spectators, going through amazing maneuvers and other evolutions which show their durability and efficiency. As one demonstration of strength, one of these land battleships will be shown with a daring soldier driving it over a contact mine of T. N. T., and as the mine explodes and the smoke clears away, the tank can be seen emerging from the crater and nonchalantly continuing in the fight.

Numerous Other Events.

There are many other events taking place both day and night in these three afternoons and evenings of thrills.

It requires a city of tents to house the complete military exposition, where all the equipment needed for the proper functioning of an army is shown. Uniforms of al our wars are displayed, the food the soldier eats and how it is cooked, every type of wagon, automobile and truck of past wars and those for future defense, prized brood mares and stallions of the remount service, field map printing machines, radios and searchlights, aerial photography, gas equipment, airplanes of every type, big guns and little guns, and a thousand and one other things an army requires, of which the unititiated does not dream.

There is an entertainment side to all this as well. Crack Army bands, including the famous United States Army Band of radio fame, will render musical programs, with dancing, vaudeville and other features that will last from 12:30 p. m. until midnight.

The exhibits will open each day at 12:30 p. m. until midnight.

The exhibits will open each day at noon, giving the spectators time to view the exhibition of the Army's resources before the actual stunts are started, and arrangements have been made to serve food, hot and cold, to those who wish to stay through both afternoon and evening performances.

Pigs Pay for Pool Used in Oklahoma

Kiwanis Club Provides Money for Bathers by Buying Porkers.

Oklahoma City, Sept. 21.—One little pig went to market—and another followed suit. And another. And another—

Until finally money began streaming back from the market which gobbled up the porkers, and soon there was a savings account at the Child Welfare League's hilltop home at Bethany.

It was the Oklahoma City Kiwanis Club that bought the pigs that paid for the pool that delights 30 children at the league's home these warm summer days.

But the Kiwanians little thought when they donated pigs for the children to raise that they were giving the youngsters a swimming pool!

Neither did the children for that matter, laughs Mrs. M. Thomas, superintendent.

"At first," she relates, "the pigs were just pets, but, of course, they weren't that very long. The bigger they got the dirtier they got. And so we began selling them."

That was two years ago. Now tots no more than 2 or 3 years old are paddling about in the pool their older companions helped build for all the world as if they'd actually been brought up on the banks of a stream.

Will Rogers Chided By Virginia Gifts

Hams, Cigarettes, Cigars, Sent to Humorist as Reproof.

Richmond, Va., Sept. 21.—Will Rogers recently referred to Virginia as the producer of only three products—razorbacks, ratttlesnakes and Presidents, but he may change his mind when he receives the tokens just sent him by the State Chamber of Commerce. These gifts include a Virginia ham, a cigarette chest covered with the skin of the largest rattlesnake which could be found in the State, and seven leading brands of Virginia-manufactured cigarettes.

The ham was donated by P. D. Gwaltney, of Smithfield, and the rattlesnake akin was the gift of Frank B. Childress, of New Market. The snake hide, which was cured by Mr. Childress, was used by the world's largest manufacturer of trunks, in Petersburg, in covering the cedar chest, which, in turn, was made by the world's largest manufacturer of cedar chests, at Altavista.

A letter from J. Gordon Bohannon, president of the Virginia State Chamber of Commerce, soliciting the humorist's better knowledge of Virginia, accompanied the conglomerate gift.

Seeming Sane Man Calls Self Lunatic

Visalia, Calif., Sept. 21.—Apparently sane, but insisting that he in reality is a dangerous maniac, J. H. Meredith, 60, of Lindsay, who was taken from the county jail here to the hospital for the insane at Stockton, appeared glad to "get home," according to Sheriff H. L. Hill. Meredith had been at Stockton before and will pay his own expenses while there.

Meredith told officers that he had a violent attack of insanity several years ago and feared he was about to have another. He declared he had had such attacks more than once, and that during them he was possessed of a homicidal mania and feared that if at large when such an attack seized him he might do serious harm to some one.

About a year ago Meredith came to Lindsay from the northern part of the State to stay with the R. A. Holcomb family, whom he had known for some time. Holcomb reluctantly signed an insanity complaint at Meredith's request. Meredith is said to be well to do and said he was willing and able to repay the State for any expense incurred.

WANDERER RETURNS TO VIEW HIS GRAVE

HAILED BY PALLBEARER

Alma, Nebr., Sept. 21 (A.P.).—John F. Bartells, weary and footsore from his travels, has returned to this community to see the grave in which he was supposedly buried 19 years ago, and to gain admission to a Masonic home.

One of his "pall bearers," J. G. Thompson, went with him to the cemetery to inspect the graves and the headstone on which is this inscription, "John F. Bartells, 1856-1909."

Bartells, once a member of the Masonic Lodge here, arrived Thursday and met Thompson. The latter said: "What are you doing here? This must be resurrection morn, for I helped bury you 20 years ago."

"I came to see my grave and get a picture of the marker," the wanderer replied, solemnly. Then he told his story.

The family came here in 1877, later moving to Neosho, Mo. He left after a quarrel with his wife. In 1908 she had him declared legally dead, as he had not been heard from since his departure in 1901. His estate was probated. Then, in 1909, Mrs. Bartells identified, as her husband, a man found dead in Illinois. The man was buried here.

Bartells returned to Neosho in 1912 after living many years in Chicago and New York. His astonished wife refused to take him back. She got a divorce, and kept the farm, for Bartells was still "dead." They moved away, telling Bartells not to follow them.

School Patrol Aid Squad Appointed

Policemen Are Instructed on Work Planned for Winter.

Detailed intructions were given yesterday to the thirteen policemen designated by Maj. Henry G. Pratt, superintendent of police, to act as supervisors and instructors of the Schoolboy Patrols during the coming school term, which starts tomorrow.

At a meeting held in the squad-room of the Traffic Bureau Inspector Ernest W. Brown, chief of the bureau, and George E. Kenelpp, manager of the District Division of the American Automobile Association, told the officers the position they are to take in working with the schoolboy patrols for the safety of Washington school children.

The policemen are to devote practically their entire time to this work, and an important phase of the task will be to deliver addresses to the children. Several of the policemen already have arranged to make such talks, Inspector Brown announced. It is expected that organization of the Schoolboy Patrols will be completed during the coming week.

Sydney, Australia, Sept. 21 (A.P.). New Trial Is Refused In Hit-and-Run Death

Special to The Washington Post.

Lynchburg, Va., Sept. 21.—Judge F. P. Christian in corporation court here today denied the motion for a new trial for R. Emmett Casey, who was convicted last week and sentenced to two years on a hit-and-run charge in connection with the death of Mrs. E. W. Crowder here on August 17.

The court held that if it erred relative to the testimony of Dr. Beverley Tucker, of Richmond, the error was in admitting the testimony at all. Appearing for the defense were Col. Aubrey E. Strode and S. Duval Marston, and for State, W. H. Jordan and Edward Meeks.

A SCHOOLBOY'S ESSAY

BY HAYDEN PEARSON

BUGS.

There are more kinds of bugs than those we studied in general science. Cheesy Alden and me and Blimpy Warner was out camping last summer, and we slept in an old shack on Ball Mountain. In the night some bugs came out and bit us. Cheesy caught some and put them in a bottle to take home. His mother said Arthur get those nasty bedbugs right out of the house this minute You certainly take after your father's side of the family in freakish ideas.

But we been taught in the Scouts to be kind to dum animals, so Cheesy put the bugs in his bed, where they would feel at home.

Unkkle Ed says there is as many kinds of bugs in this world as there is people and most everybody is bugs over something. The Jones who live next door to us fight a lot and one time I herd her say to him you pore insect I don't see why in the world I ever married you and he said something under his breath. But Mr. Jones is an ideel man, he don't smoke or chew or swar out loud or drink and he stays home every night so I don't see how a man like that can be an insect. I asked Unkkle Ed if a man could be a bug and an insect at the same time and he said any man who lets his wife boss him around fills all the necessary qualifications for a first class buggy insect. Your mother, young man, bosses your father around shamefully and she allways has. She used to try to boss me around before your father had the misfortune to make her ackquaintance.

But ma said Ed for goodness sake use the few brains the Lord endowed you with, and don't be sore because women are growing intelligent and you won't get married. Then she said pa aint you bugs over me and pa said Rosy I'm all kinds of bugs over you. And then pa and ma smiled at each other like they didn't notice me and Unkkle Ed at all.

SHARKEY MUST STOP LOUGHRAN FOR RECOGNITION

West Virginia Wins in Grid Debut, 16-0

Wesleyan Beaten By Varied Attack of Mountaineers.

Bartung Scores Twice and M. Glenn Kicks Field Goal.

MORGANTOWN, W. Va., Sept. 21 (A.P.).—A varied attack that overpowered the defense of West Virginia Wesleyan today gave West Virginia University's football team a 16-to-0 victory in the season's opener. Bartrug, Mountaineer half back, scored both of West Virginia's touchdowns, and M. Glenn, captain and quarter back, added the other four points with a successful try for point after touchdown and a placement kick.

Neither team scored in the first quarter. The Mountaineer backs hammered the somewhat weak Bobcat line for goodly gains, but Wesleyan staved off the attack, aided by a penalty or two by breaking up the one attempt the Mountaineers made at an aerial thrust. M. Glenn tried a placement from the 40-yard mark, but the ball fell short.

Straight Football Nets Touchdown.

West Virginia University's straight football tactics netted a touchdown in the second quarter. The Wesleyan line held off the Mountaineers twice within its 10-yard line and prevented a score early in the period. However, West Virginia, in a series of thrusts, carried the ball down the field in a third drive and Bartrug took it over. M. Glenn made good on his placement kick in the point after touchdown.

Both sides failed to make first downs. West Virginia took the ball on the 28-yard line and gains by Varney and three line smashes registered a first down for the Mountaineers, with the ball on the 27-yard marker. Bartrug, Varney and Larue gained 18 yards and a first down on the 9-yard mark. Bartrug went over for a touchdown after Varney slammed through center for four yards.

M. Glenn Kicks Goal From Placement.

Rodriguez fumbled and West Virginia recovered on her 20-yard line. A line drive netted a first down on the Mountaineer 40-yard line. After M. Glenn had fumbled a pass to give the ball to Wesleyan, he intercepted a pass and raced to the Wesleyan 20-yard stripe. Then a placement from M. Glenn's boot was good and three points were added to the Mountaineer tally. Brown recovered Battles' fumble as the game ended. Final score: West Virginia, 16; Wesleyan, 0.

Boston, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Boston made it two out of three games from Cleveland here today by winning 4 to 3 in 12 innings. Pitcher Bayne knocked Todt in with the winning run with a single over Averill's head.

Boston had 16 men left on base and Cleveland 6. Neither Russell, who pitched nine innings, or Bayne passed a man.

Clinton Brown, recent Indian addition from New Orleans, would have pitched a winning game but for Tavener's wild throw to the plate in the ninth.

NATS BEATEN BY STEWART OF BROWNS

Southpaw Gives Only Four Hits in Gaining 4-3 Victory.

as though Jones had found his bearings, but that he hadn't was quickly shown in the next inning, when Blue, McNeely, Manush and Schulte, the first four batters up, singled in succession. Jones managed to hold the onslaught to two runs, but Johnson decided that it was not his day and sent Burke to the hill starting the fourth. He granted but one hit in the next four innings, while Braxton, who hurled the eighth and ninth, allowed but two and was never in trouble.

Only one hit was needed to give the Nats their only earned run of the game, it being Cronin's triple, opening the home second. After West fouled to the catcher, Spencer brought the run home with a sacrifice fly to center. A double by Cronin and a pass to West, both coming with two out in the fourth, were wasted, and then the Nationals fell just one run short of tying things up in the seventh, which proved to be their last chance.

Errors Aid Nats to Score Two Runs in Eighth.

Only one hit, West's opening single, came in this round, as Stewart and Melillo contributed a bad throw apiece which helped the home cause considerably and gave the 3,000 shivering fans a chance to get warmed up cheering. Spencer, second up, forced West midway and Hayes would have done the same thing but for the fact that Stewart, who fielded the ball, threw it to center field, letting Spencer carry on to third.

After Gooch, up for Burke, had walked, filling the bases, Judge looped a sacrifice fly to center. Spencer registered after the catch, and it lookd as though Hayes would be caught trying to advance to third, but Melillo's throw went into the Browns' dugout and he scored, while Gooch pulled up at third. This put it up to Rice, but he failed, and Cronin, who coaxed a walk in the eighth, was the only other native to see base life over the balance of the rout.

Heinie Manush, with three singles, was credited with one-third of the St. Louis hits, while McNeely was the only other Brownie to get more than one, one of his pair being a double. West, with a single, and Goslin, with a double, accounted for the only other home safeties not chalked down on Cronin's record.

The outstanding fielding play was the twin killing staged by the Nationals in the fifth. Myer made a fine stop and pivot throw, starting it, while Cronin had to make the catch at second with one hand, at arm's length, and to follow through with a line peg to Judge.

New York, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—The Yankees bated out an easy victory over the White Sox here today in the second game of the series. The score was 8 to 5.

Ed Wells kept the eight Chicago hits well scattered, but the Yanks bunched their blows off Ted Lyons. Reynolds hit a homer with one on in the seventh.

Macks in Last Game Here Today

Earnshaw and Hadley Likely Opponents in Final Appearance.

Loepp May Join Club in Time for Series With Yankees.

By FRANK H. YOUNG.

THE new American League champions, the Philadelphia Athletics, will end their 1929 season here this afternoon in a Sabbath attraction. In order to keep his stars on edge for the coming world's title set with the Chicago Cubs, Connie Mack is expected to use his regular line-up, for most of the game at least.

While the game does not mean much to the Mackmen, the Nats will be out there trying particularly hard for two reasons. The first is because the Macks have beaten them so regularly this season that they want to make their showing in this respect as good as possible, and the second is because of the need of the victory to help the club nose out Bucky Harris' Tigers in the fifth-place scrap.

George Earnshaw, one of Mack's best flingers, is expected to do the Philadelphia slab work, while Irving Hadley is due to toil on the hill for the Nationals. And if Hadley shows anywhere near the form that he did against the Tigers last Wednesday, when he granted but five hits and set a new season's strikeout record, getting eleven victims, the new league champs will find the going plenty rough.

Tate, Hurt by Foul, Faces Idle Spell.

Bennie Tate will be forced to idle for the next three or four days because of an injured finger received as a result of a foul from Earl McNeely's bat in the fifth inning of Friday's game. The little finger of his right hand is badly swollen. As Tuesday and Wednesday are open dates, however, Tate likely will not miss more than two more games.

4 Hits for Simmons As A's Down Tigers

Philadelphia, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—The Athletics made a clean sweep of their series with the Tigers by taking the third game here this afternoon by 10 to 7. The champions put the game on ice when they bunched seven runs in the fifth, the sixth and the seventh.

Al Simmons strengthened his bid for the American League hitting title by slapping out four clean singles in five times at bat. His teammate rival, Jimmy Foxx, drew four straight walks and then grounded out to short.

Carroll Yerkes, who followed Bill Breckenridge to the hill in the fifth inning, got credit for the victory, his first of the season.

Capt. Sloan Returns to Lead Veteran Backfield.

By SHIRLEY L. POVICH, (Sports Editor of The Post).

Charlottesville, Va., Sept. 21.—The University of Virginia harboring serious designs against all opposition in the approaching football campaign and the ascension to State supremacy, very possible, would be gratifying, but incidental to the Cavaliers, who are aiming higher.

Besides games with Virginia Military Institute, Washington & Lee and Virginia Poly, the Cavaliers are reckoning with South Carolina, Maryland and North Carolina before thoughts of a highly successful campaign may be entertained. Unlike their State rivals, the Cavaliers' ambitions are not confined to the mythical Virginia State title, which is both nectar and ambrosia to V. M. I., V. P. I. and the Generals.

As the season wears on, arrpehensive eyes are being trained on Virginia by its opposition in the South. Coach Greasy Neale has departed and Coach Earl Abell, formerly of Colgate, has assumed the reins and discarded the methods in which the Cavaliers have been schooled under Neale for the past several years.

Impressive Squad Has 200-Pound Line.

Coach Abell is working with the most impressive appearing squad that this correspondent has noted in his tour of the Virginia colleges. Blessed with a line scaling an average of 200 pounds from end to end and with a back field composed entirely of veterans, Virginia will be operating at a great fundamental advantage with the promise that the voice of the Cavaliers will be heard in booming tones in any award of honors in the South Atlantic section.

Virginia this season is not burdened with a schedule as severe in past seasons with three apparent "breathers" gracing the list of nine games. The opener next Saturday with Randolph-Macon is causing no fear and ensuing battles with Swarthmore in the third game and St. John's in the fifth test are virtually conceded the Cavaliers. The game with Princeton, which had been regarded as an annual event, has been dropped this year in favor of Swarthmore, but will be resumed in 1930. This shift has lessened considerably the severity of the Cavaliers' schedule.

Meet South Carolina In Second Game.

But Virginia will be entitled to the fullest consideration in any award of honors if the Cavaliers are successful in the remaining games of schedule. South Carolina, to be met in the second game October 5 at Columbia, again is being hailed as a "wonder" team, a reputation it acquired last year after defeating Chicago, V. M. I., Washington and Lee and Virginia Poly all demand serious attention as will Maryland. The Thanksgiving Day with North Carolina on November 28 at Chapel Hill is the battle on which Virginia has its heart set and the Tarheels shape up as a worthy test of any team.

Coach Abell has turned to his work with a will at Virginia and declares himself pleased with his prospects and the cooperation he is receiving from both Jimmy Driver, new athletic director at the University and Archie Hahn, assistant coach, who have lessened considerably the labors of the new head coach in installing his system of play.

The presence of Capt. Johnny Sloan in the backfield provides the Cavaliers with a typical threat. Sloan, the terror of all opposition last season, again is the mainspring of the Virginia attack with his running, kicking and passing proclivities. His deceptive tactics are well known to Virginia's opponents, most of whom met the Cavaliers in 1928.

Sloan's Heavy Burden To Be Lightened.

The Sloan angle of Virginia's offense has been altered by Head Coach Abell who was not in accord with Neale's system of working his shifty quarterback almost incessantly. Carrying the ball 75 per cent of the time last season, Sloan was consistently brilliant but Abell believes that his efficiency can be considerably increased by less work and more application to the direction of the play from his post at quarterback.

Sloan, a veritable bear for work, also will do the kicking for the Cavaliers, but Coach Abell has surrounded him with three running mates in Hunter Faulconer, Gus Kaminer and Albert Lewy, who are well able to share the offensive burden. Only Lefty Close is lost from the 1928 backfield and Abell's tentative first-string quartet combines the pleasing quality of ability with interference.

Faulconer and Kaminer, like Sloan are the speed boys of the backfield, with Lewy available for the line hammering when necessary. But Abell is well fortified in reserve backfield material with any one of four others likely to find his way into the line-up frequently.

Guard Only Weakness Noted in Line.

These reserve backs are Frank Sipley, Hun School product, who may step into Sloan's place at quarter back if needed; Bill Thomas, the star Freshman full back of last fall, whose broken-field running stamped him a sensation and who is the most likely to displace one of the first-string four if he lives up to promise; Herbert Bryant, the hard-running full back from Episcopal High School and Feyhan Odenheimer.

The effectiveness of Sloan, who was considerably harried by weakness in the line last year, is not expected to be hampered by this season's forwards, who have been executing their plays in gratifying fashion. If Coach Abell is able to fortify his guard positions on a par with the remainder of his line, then Virginia will be very pleasingly situated. Only at guard is there a noticeable weakness.

Dick Day and Hunter Metley, guards of last year, are being groomed to fill in at tackle berths, with Dunn and Ivey the outstanding candidates for their former positions. These posts have been considerably weakened by the loss of Capt. Bill Luke at tackle and De Butts, Austin and Symington at guard.

Dick Turner Relieves Worries at End.

Battling Day and Motley for a tackle position is Larry Whalen with a grist of candidates challenging the bid of Dunn and Ivey for the guard positions. These are Wood, of the reserves; Lankford, former Virginia Episcopal captain, and Gordon Fuller.

Coach Abell's worries at one of the ends have been dissipated by the continued brilliant play of Dick Turner, former Tech High star, of Washington, D. C., who held down the position so cleverly in 1928. Turner's running mate is far from chosen, with

Giants Beat Cubs, 4-1; Ott Hits 40th Homer

Chicago, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Charley Root held New York in check for seven inning today but faltered in the last two and the Giants took a 4 to 1 decision over the champion Cubs.

Melvin Ott's fortieth home run of the season, with Terry on base in the eighth inning, started the Giants on the way to victory. Two unnecessary runs were added on four hits in the ninth. Ott's circuit clout gave him a lead of one over Hack Wilson and Chuck Klein for home run honors in the league.

In winning, Bill Walker, the southpaw, held the Cubs to eight hits, while the Giants collected thirteen off Charley Root.

Bill Terry and Freddy Lindstrom led the New York attack with three hits apiece. Hornsby went hitless and fell behind Terry in the league batting race.

Walker's victory over the Cubs was the ninth achieved by a southpaw this year. The Giants close their stand here tomorrow and then the Cubs are idle for five days.

2 Big Fights End Outdoor Season

Campolo and Scott to Mingle Tomorrow at Ebbets Field.

Loughran, Heavier, Is Serious Menace to Sailor's Ambition.

By EDWARD J. NEIL, (Associated Press Sports Writer).

NEW YORK, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—The chill fingers of early autumn, groping for the remnants of the major league baseball season, will brush the final traces of the outdoor box fighting campaign from metropolitan ball yards this coming week.

On Monday and Thursday the fight faithful, game to the last shiver, will wind on the mufflers for two sets of heavyweight tussles, the dessert of the fistic offerings, and thus saved for the last. Both shows will have some bearing on the elimination of chief grabbers for the vacant heavyweight throne.

Victorio Campolo, the Manassa mauler from the Argentine, jammed his ten-round joust with Phil Scott, the stately London fireman, into the week as Tommy Loughran's bid for heavyweight fame against Jack Sharkey by by forcing two postponements of Humbert J. Fugazy's chief offering of the season at Ebbetts Field in Brooklyn. This show will be put on Monday. Campolo, toughest and most promising of the season's mammoth developments, contracted a pain just where his area is widest, the back, and elimination of the kink took two full weeks.

Defeat to Shove Sharkey Into Second Division.

Clashing with this attraction, Madison Square Garden will give Sharkey, the expressive former sailor from Boston, another golden opportunity to stamp his worth on the heavyweight division in the Yankee Stadium Thursday night. A one-sided victory or knockout of Loughran will give Sailor John the post position in the race for Gene Tunney's discarded crown and guarantee him a job in the main bout next winter of the Garden's annual extravaganza at Miami, Fla. efeat will shove Sharkey back in the second row, where he has been tossed several times, but never anchored since the night Jack Dempsey stowed him away two years ago.

Loughran, grown to a full-fledged heavyweight since renouncing the 175-pound coronet, is a decided menace to the well being and ambitions of the large leather slingers.

Tommy hits none too hard, but his fine left jab, experience and perfect ring craft makes Sharkey's task difficult. The Philadelphia adonis, an even-money choice to defeat Sharkey, probably would become a decided favorite for the title if he could outspar the Boston battler. The 15-round duel is expected to draw a gate well over 200,000.

Campolo Favorite to Win From Scott.

Campolo, six feet seven inches of crude by belligerent manpower, is slightly favored to whip Scott in the Brooklyn Ball Park. The Englishman's boxing ability, smart left hand, and greater experience may keep the Argentine at bay for ten rounds. The belief that he chased Max Schmeling back to Europe has improved Scott's morale and obliterated most of the painful memories of his first venture here, a one-round knockout at Knute Hanson's hands. Campolo's work has been both colorful and sensational in victories over Arthur De Kuh and Tom Heeney.

Bill Paxton and Bill Byrd, both from the reserves, making determined bids Byrd's added weight has affected his chances for the position, however Two recruits from last year's Freshmen are also waging a merry battle for an end berth. These are John Peyton, up from Woodberry Forest, and Sam Lee, from Lynchburg High School.

With a backfield that has one outstanding threat and a line that is big and fast, Virginia's chief concern is in the strength of its reserves. Virginia's Team must not only be reckoned with by all opposition, but the squad that Coach Abell will present can be justly "feared."

Sam Hildreth, Trainer, To Go Under Knife

New York, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Sam Hildreth, trainer of Harry F. Sinclair's Rancocas Stable, will be operated on Monday for an intestinal ailment, it was announced today by the Fifth Avenue Hospital, where he was taken last night.

Mr. Hildreth, who is over 70 years of age, has been suffering from stomach trouble for some time.

A Guide to Value

Experts can judge the value of a fabric by handling and examing it. Its texture and its feel all mean something to their trained eyes and fingers. Yet even experts sometimes err in their judgment.

There is a surer and safer index of values than the senses of sight and touch. Knowledge of the maker's name and what it stands for.

The "Wilner" label on a garment is a guarantee of fine fabric, expert workmanship and assurance of a correct fit.

Good clothes at reasonable prices for 33 years and still worthy of your confidence, and whether you invest $40 or $100, you are always assured of honest value.

Latavich Wins in Gallop.

Trainer B. S. Michell, who got in from Belmont Park this morning, won with the first horse he sent to the post when Herbert Bayard Swoop's Latavich galloped home in front of his opposition in the fifth race. Rose waited with Latavich and delayed his effort until they swung into the home stretch. He was trailing Way Eagle at this stage, and when the latter bore out some at the turn Latavich came through next to the rail to assume an easy lead, and in the final furlong he had things pretty much his own way.

Dunmore was second, beaten a length and a half, and then followed Light View another length away. The latter finished in resolute fashion and was going strong at the end.

Fifteen 2-year-olds lined up at the barrier in the opening event, a claiming race of five and a half furlongs. Several of the lot were well fancied, and it was a good betting affair. The field was at the post five minutes before Starter Milton got them bunched, and they left to a good break. In the early running, Alwington Dolly dashed to the front, and, in the run down the back stretch, drew away into a lead of a length and a half.

She was doing well within herself and held command of the situation until well past the furlong pole, when Parnell Bound began responding with good courage, wore down and passed the tiring pacemaker to win, going away at the end by a length and a half. Etuscan was third, a head for the place, and then followed Doritaus. The latter was a disappointment and failed miserably when she looked to have a good winning chance at the top of the home stretch.

James Lowe saddled his first winner of the meeting for the Rancocas Stable, when he sent the Zev colt Zeal to the post in the second race. Chimney Sweep and Prometheus, coupled as the Harry Payne Whitney entry, the top-heavy favorites, went to the post at a very short price.

In the early stages of the stuggle it appeared as if the Whitney pair would finish one, two. Prometheus was in front, racing well in hand, with Chimney Sweep close up. Zeal was third, a couple of lengths away. They raced in this order until making the turn into the homestretch, where Steffen made his move with Zeal.

When called on, the latter responded in a manner that made it evident that he would be troublesome to the Whitney pair when the final test came. In the last sixteenth Prometheus began to weaken with Zeal charging in a determined manner, and in a stirring finish the Rancocas colt was up in time to win by a nose. Chimney Sweep was third, beaten something over a length for the place.

The Rancocas Stable made it a double when Mei Foo came back after Zeal's victory to win the third race. Steffen was again in the saddle and victory was again due to a well-judged ride and strong finish on his part.

A field of twelve lined up at the barrier and Searcher, very fractious, refused to join in his field. A twitch was put on him and when one of the assistant starters got him in the stall. Milton sprang the barrier and Searcher, instead of breaking out of it, tried to wheel, with the result that he was left at the post. Caroler, another of the field, refused to break.

Toki, with Albert Smock in the saddle, began quickly and was soon out in front setting a fast pace. Toki appeared to have matters pretty much her own way until entering the home stretch, when she began to stop. Smock had lost one of his irons and was busy trying to place his foot back in the stirrup. Under these tactics Toki naturally stopped and Steffen, sending Mei Foo up with a rush, caught and passed Toki in the last couple of strides to win by a neck.

My Sis was third, beaten a length for the place.

PARNELL BOUND, a forward contender from the start, finished full of courage when called on and, wearing the tiring ALWINGTON DOLLY down, was up in the last sixteenth to win going away at the end. ALWINGTON DOLLY left the post in her usual rapid manner, showed keen speed, but weakened after going five furlongs. ST. TUSCAN well up throughout, raced on the outside of leaders. ZEAL was ridden in very confident manner. Steffen rated his mount in hand until straightened out for the final run, when he charged on the leaders on outside. ZEAL responded full of courage when called on and, wearing PROMETHEUS down, was up in the final strides. Latter raced boldly and was under restraint first half mile. He faltered when called on. Workman may have been a bit overconfident. CHIMNEY SWEEP was a keen factor all the way. The others were never serious factors.

MEI FOO was rated off the pacemakers to top of stretch, responded with a bold effort when called on and, wearing TOKI down, was up in the final strides. TOKI, a rapid beginner, dashed to the front and set a rapid pace. Smock lost one of his irons during the running and was busy last quarter trying to put his foot in stirrup. This was probably responsible for his defeat. MY SIS weakened after making a determined bid at top of home stretch. One of assistant starters had hold of the fractious SEARCHER when break came. Allen rode a patient race on ROSE OF SHARON. He rated the latter under restraint first seven furlongs. ROSE OF SHARON moved up stoutly when called on and held her opposition safe all last furlong. GLEN WILD, in the heat of battle from the break, had a lot taken out of him racing BEACON HILL into submission, but hung on with good courage when the final test came. LATIVICH was taken in hand and restrained for six furlongs, moved up on the inside rounding the far turn and came through next the rail on entering the home stretch, assumed an easy lead and won with something to spare at the finish. DUNMORE hung after making his effort at top of stretch. LIGHT VIEW raced in hand until furlong. He was going stoutly at the finish. WAR EAGLE tired badly last quarter.

STANDARD BEARER, slow to begin and outrun first half mile, closed with a good burst of speed rounding the far turn and easily disposed of opposition in stretch run. SIR LEONID was never able to improve his position.

THYMON had a rough journey, was sharply cut off when he attempted to go through on the inside at turn out of back stretch, came again and, finishing full of courage, wore FIRE WATCH down to get up in final strides. FIRE WATCH hung after moving up stoutly and, taking the lead at top of home stretch, HAPPY JACK had a lot taken out of him racing OVERLOOK into submission. CORINTH sulked.

ST. JOSEPH, GEORGETOWN NINES OPEN TITLE SERIES

Ancient Foes Renew Old Rivalry

District Unlimited Honors Claimed by Both Teams.

McIntyre and Taylor Slated for Mound Duel Today.

AN ANCIENT rivalry that has grown of a more friendly nature with the years will be revived today when the Georgetown A. C. and St. Joseph A. C. Nines begin their battle for the 1929 District unlimited baseball championship. They will stage the first engagement of their scheduled three-game title series on Friendship Field, starting at 3 o'clock.

Bill Flester's Georgetown Club claims an undefeated record among Washington teams. Frank Cinotti's Saints have just emerged from a long, arduous campaign with their fourth Capital City League gonfalon. The rival managers are laying claims to the District title and their records tend to substaniate any claims they have staked.

Battled for League Title in 1928.

District championship rivalry between these two teams is of long standing. Only last year, they waged a bitter fight for the Capital City League crown, Georgetown taking the honors by the slightest of margins.

The teams meet today for the first time on a strictly amateur basis. In previous years, padding for the important clashes was indulged in by both managers. The teams that meet today will be the same that have carried on throughout the season. Cinotti plans to use the same line-up that won the league title. Flester will depend on the same faithful ten that has turned back the best in independent ranks.

Lefty McIntyre, who has carried the brunt of the Georgetown A. C. pitching since midseason when he deserted the Milwaukee Club of the American Association League, will get the mound call against the Capital City League champs. His lone assistant, Chaconas, is needed in the outfield, so it is up to the "iron man" to go the route.

Taylor Thought Best St. Joe Hurler.

Cinotti thinks Shaut Taylor is his best bet. Frank thinks the St. Joseph title is largely due to the sensational work of this little right-hander during the closing weeks of the campaign. Taylor earned a great victory over the Dixie Pigs last week and a repetition of that performance today would make plenty of trouble for the independent title claimants. However, the Saints have Eddie Cauliflower, Dick Hughes, Joe Preschl and Henry Phipps also ready for pitching duty.

The second game of the series will be played next Sunday.

Cubs' and Macks' Parks About Same Size

Philadelphia, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—So far as size goes, there is little difference in the playing fields at Shibe Park and Wrigley Field, where the 1929 world series will be played.

Right and center fields at Shibe Park are a little longer than Wrigley Field, while left field on the Chicago grounds is longer than at the Philadelphia park.

The dimensions of the playing fields are:

Shibe Park.		Wrigley Field.

Another McMillin Bids for Stardom

Manhattan, Kans., Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Ray McMillin may carry on where his cousin "Bo," of Centre College fame, left off.

Like his relative, who once astounded the football world by leading the Kentucky school to a victory over Harvard, Ray is a quarter back. His ambition is to pilot the Kansas Aggies Eleven coached by "Bo."

Golf Now Enters Field Of Commercial Affairs

Boston, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Golf is becoming a business.

Courses open to the public are steadily increasing in number in Massachusetts. They are operated by business men who find the investment a paying one. Statistics have shown even municipal courses to be profit paying.

One man is reported to have sold a prosperous commercial enterprise to give his whole time to the management of a nine-hole golf course and the construction of another.

AUTO RACES AT FAIR AT RALEIGH

Auto Polo Games to Feature Night's Entertainment.

RALEIGH, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Auto racing has been definitely decided upon as the big attraction for Saturday afternoon, October 19, at the State fair here. T. B. Smith, secretary, announced that automobile races would be held and put at rest all rumors as to what would be the chief amusement attractions for the last day of fair week.

For some time the fair management considered having a real train wreck, with two locomotives meeting head-on at a speed of about 50 miles an hour, but it was finally decided that the auto racing would draw bigger crowds, especially since the State fair track is now the leading track in the State available for auto racing.

Fair officials also announced today that in addition to the auto races the last day of fair week, the original American and British auto polo teams would stage nightly auto polo games in front of the grandstand.

Auto Polo Likely to Furnish Crashes.

The fair authorities, in announcing that there would be no train crash, said that auto polo should at least to some extent satisfy anybody set on seeing something crash. A description of the game says that auto smash-ups are regular and often; and they will be a daily attraction.

The fair auto races will be under the auspices of the American Automobile Association and any records set will be accepted as official. Ralph A. Hankinson, who was in charge of the State fair auto races last year, will again handle them.

On the first five days of the week horse racing will be the big attraction each afternoon. Purses totaling $7,200 are offered for the State fair races and over 100 horses are already entered. Convicts who have been engaged in getting the fair grounds ready are now devoting their entire time to putting the finishing touches on the track so that it will be in tip-top shape for both horse and auto events.

South Bend, Ind., Sept. 21 (A.P.).—John Law, who captains Notre Dame's football team, is what Knute Rockne calls a "watch charm" guard. Law weighs only 163 pounds. He fought his way to the captaincy from an unstable place on the fourth frosh team.

STANFORD UNIVERSITY, Calif., Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Formation B, the bit of football "whirligiggery" that dazzled opposition in 1928, has been shelved for future reference at Stanford, but another complicated style of play promises to worry rival elevens this year.

Coach Glenn ("Pop") Warner has merely dropped back one letter in the alphabet and recalled formation "A," the original system of offense he introduced here a few seasons back. Each founded on deception, the formations differ only in this way:

A calls upon the full back to handle the ball from center, while B imposes that duty upon the quarter back. In the A line-up the quarter back stands a yard back of the line, while the full back is on his left, three yards back. The B style requires this pair of ball luggers to play three yards and six yards, respectively, in back of the line. In either case the half backs retain their flank positions, a yard behind the line and outside the ends.

Open Game Features Play This Year.

Use of the B formation, to start the season, was abandoned by Coach Warner because its intricacies are too much to master in the short time allowed for practice. It will be revived, however, when the schedule is well under way.

Stanford offers for approval this season a team of much promise, composed of many veterans and molded around an open game.

The new rule, which makes a fumbled ball dead where recovered by the defense, has been seized upon by Coach Warner to further his plans of a spectacular offense.

To observers fortunate enough to "crash" the practice field gate, every other Stanford play seems to revolve around one or two lateral passes. Trickery rules supreme at every snap back of the ball.

Eleven letter men said good-by after last season, but experienced men are on hand for all positions. The greatest loss resulted from the departure of the great pair of guards—Post and Robesky. Warner plays require brawn and brains in these positions. Driscoll and Heiser, seasoned players, are being groomed for the work.

Back Field Material Is Plentiful.

Material abounds for the back field berths. Lud Frentrup, all-around ball carrier, is looked upon as the mainstay at left half, with Harlow Rothert, of shot-putting fame, bidding strongly for the job of running mate. Bill Simpkins has convinced the crowd he can fill "Biff" Hoffman's shoes at full back and the two giants, "Chuck" Smalling and Herb Fleishhacker, alternating at quarter back, are the last word in power-plus.

A hard Coast schedule of ten games will be climaxed December 28, when the Army Team comes to the shores of the Pacific in an effort to pound Stanford's big boys into submission. Army tried the same stunt last year in New York City, but the Stanford stalwarts came home on the long end of the 26-0 score.

Cumberland Suffers Deficit on Baseball

Cumberland, Md., Sept. 21.—Community baseball closed here with the Cumberland club $1,515.70 in debt. The receipts for the season amounted to $42,834.28. The promoters are not discouraged for the first year of community baseball, and with the experience it is hoped to produce better results next year.

The receipts of the 60 games played at home amounted to $22,160.64, which was over three times the amount received on the road, which was $6,060.80. The receipts include $6,505 subscribed by fans at the opening of the season to start the team off.

John A. Gallen was appointed chairman of a committee to devise ways and means to clear the debts before the first of the year. Others on the committee are Eugene Law, William J. Cubbage, Rudolph Valentine, Frank Davis, George M. Hast and Jack Gallivan.

BRAZIL FIRST RATER.

One of the outstanding back field men in the country should be Lloyd Brazil, brilliant Detroit back, who was mentioned for all-American honors last year.

CUBS BOUGHT PLAYERS AT CUT RATE

Championship Group Cost Owner About $400,000.

CHICAGO, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Taking the rubber hand off the wallet has been one of the things the Cub management has done with alacrity, but this year's National League champions do not represent more than $400,000 in hard cash.

Rogers Hornsby was a fancy addition at $240,000, considering the cash value of players involved. The Cubs bought him from Boston.

On the other hand, Guy Bush, the hurling ace, was a bargain—$1,200, and Hack Wilson, the pugnacious one, was almost a gift, $5,000. Pat Malone, who moved his suitcase from Minneapolis, cost $30,000, and Bill Veeck laid down $30,000 to the American Association for Woody English, collegiate-looking shortstop.

Norman McMillan, the hot-corner inhabitant, came from the association for $5,000, and Los Angeles and Portland received $10,000 for Charlie Root and Sheriff Blake. Art Nehf was a bargain buy, but Hal Carlson cost $30,000, including the players that went to Philadephia in the deal.

Stephenson Cost Club $12,000.

Veeck gave Indianapolis $12,000 for Riggs Stephenson, and Kiki Cuyler set the bank balance back $20,000.

Cliff Heathcote cost nothing as he was traded for Max Flack, and Flack was the property of the Federal League club, which the Cub management bought. Heathcote came from St. Louis. Gonzales and Taylor, the catchers, were Christmas presents from St. Louis and Boston.

Charlie Grimm has been worth many times the $35,000 that the Cubs gave Pittsburgh for him.

The Wilson trade was a David Harum deal, and can be credited to Joe McCarthy, the manager. Hack had been tried by McGraw and shipped to Toledo, with an option in the New York office. Through a clerical error the Giants failed to exercise their option within the time limit. McCarthy, managing Louisville, but under contract to the Cubs for the next year, notified Veeck, and Wilson was picked up for the draft price, $5,000.

Had the Cubs not been near the bottom that year some other club would have had first choice of Wilson.

Georgetown Insects Can Clinch League Flag Today

Must Defeat Corinthians to Maintain Winning Margin; 3-Cornered Title Tie Likely If Leaders Are Beaten.

GEORGETOWN'S young stalwarts who have set the pace for rival contenders in the Capital City League Insect baseball race since early in the summer, today meet their major test of the long campaign. They meet the Corinthians on South Ellipse diamond at 3 o'clock with the championship as their goal.

The Corinthians offer the lone obstacle in the title path for the youthful stars, who do most of their pastiming around Corcoran playground. A victory means the championship for the Westerners. A defeat means a probable three-corner tie for first place with the Sam West, Eastern All-Star and Georgetown teams involved.

Protests and Forfeits Flare Back.

Although defeated four times during the campaign, the Georgetown team has twice won decisions on protests brought to the attention of league officials. These victories by forfeiture have robbed the Georgetown lads of much of the glory thus far, but they mean to establish their claim to the championship today.

Manager Oddone has primed his charges for the fray. The occasion of the meeting with the Corinthians has been anxiously awaited. It will be a big day, with all regulars back on the job and the players in a fighting mood despite two weeks of inactivity.

Although out of the race for the title, the Corinthians will make their strongest bid for triumph today. Coach Walter Newman, of the Corinthians, has declared. His charges defeated the Georgetown team several weeks ago, but the use of an ineligible player cost his team the decision. An eligible Corinthian team will take the field today, Newman stated, and nothing would please him more than to stop the pennant dash of the Georgetown nine.

Lomax and Turner On Mound.

The rival managers will send their mound aces after rivals' scalps. Southpaw Ralph Lomax will carry the burden for the title contenders. Eddie Turner, an orthodox flinger, will start for the Corinthians. A hurling duel is promised.

TOP RANK AS SHORTSTOP SEEN FOR JOE CRONIN

Poise Is Need Of Youthful Nat Star

Coast "Kid" Famous for Sensational Fielding.

"Hitting in Pinch" Big Factor in His Success.

By FRANK H. YOUNG.

TIME was when the American League boasted several brilliant shortstops, but a glance over the rosters of the eight teams shows that not only is there no outstanding star at present covering the territory between second and third but that there has been none since Roger Peckinpaugh and "Midget Joe" Sewell were in their prime.

Washington fans, who have seen Joe Cronin in action day in and day out, however, believe that he will be responsible for a change in this condition within the next year or two—and the dope indicates that they are right in their contention. The records show that the youthful Nat short fielder has made many errors this season—many too many—but they do not show how many of his assists were hit-robbery of enemy sharpshooters, due to the fact that he goes after everything and comes up with many balls that another would not even get close to.

It is an odd fact that many of Cronin's errors are on comparatively easy chances; in fact, his greatest fielding weakness seems to be on balls hit directly at him. There is no question, however, but what he can go as far to either side as any player in the business, being particularly good on his left, while the fact that he does not care about his average, but goes after everything, makes him an ideal type of player to have around.

Experts Say Joe Plays Too Far Back.

Some of the so-called experts claim that Joe plays his position too deeply, which greatly reduces his chances of throwing out runners on slow hit balls but, from the opposite angle, playing deep enables him to cover more territory, both for grounders and for Texas Leaguers. On the field, Cronin gives the impression of being nervous, for he fidgets about considerably and apparently does not know what to do with his hands, but his mates are authority for the statement that looks are deceiving and that Joe is as cool as a cucumber in the heat of battle.

Steadiness is something which comes from experience and which Cronin is bound to get ere long, and when he adds this to his natural ability and his fighting spirit, many believe that he will develop into the best shortstop of recent years.

Although Cronin saw service for an entire season with the Pittsburgh Pirates—the word "saw" being used advisedly, for he spent most of the year sitting on the bench watching games—he has just turned 22, which means that his best years are just ahead of him. His case, like that of so many other players in baseball, is one of contradiction.

When Scout Joe Engel uncovered Cronin with the Kansas City American Association team last year, he reported that his find looked like a great future fielding prospect, but could not hit. When Cronin reported here during the fag-end of the season, Bucky Harris, then manager, immediately started him at shortstop and he filled that position during that period when the Nationals staged their final spurt, which showed them traveling faster than any club in the league.

Opposing Pitchers Respect Cronin.

While Engel's statement that Cronin could not hit was borne out by the averages, for his stick mark was a puny .243, a closer glance at the figures shows that the comparatively few hits which he did make came at timely moments and that his blows were responsible for 25 runs. This season, however, Cronin is not held lightly by opposing pitchers.

Right now he is hitting around the .275 mark, and that he is improving steadily is proven by his extra-base-blow record, which shows that he has pounded out seven home runs, nine triples and twenty-four doubles.

The "San Francisco Kid," as his mates call him, is an ideal type of athlete, who takes his work seriously. The strides he has made since coming here last year have been great. And, if he continues to improve in the future as he has in the recent past, there is no question but what he may rank with the top-notchers next year, or surely in 1931.

16 Washington Boys On Md. Frosh Squad

Thirty-nine aspirants for the freshmen football team at the University of Maryland are toiling under the direction of Jack Faber, head coach and 16 of them are former Washington high school students. However, three of the Capital boys and seven others never played the grid game in high school.

Washington youths with grid experience with the Old Line yearlings are: Daniel Galotta, end, Tech-Emerson; Dorlance Kelly, end, Eastern; William Wood, end and back, Eastern; Joseph Lucas, end, St. John's; Edward Molenof, guard, Eastern; George Cole, tackle, Tech; Robert McMillin, guard, Western; Harold Norwood, back, Tech; Fred Stelzer, back, Tech; Donald Imiris, back, Western-Devitt; Carl Pfaff, back, Tech; Lawrence Plumley, back, Central; Ernest Fountain, back, Tech.

Those from Washington who are trying football for the first time are: Everett Herrell and Kermit Hunt, Central, and John Vignar, Tech.

There are only four players in Faber's aggregation who tip the scales at more than 170 pounds and the squad averages just about 160 to the man. The average age is under 19 years.

Faber is being aided by Knobby Thomas, of Washington, and Gus Crothers, former Old Line athletic stars.

"Red" Halliday, former Ohio Wesleyan star, is coaching the University of Cincinnati back field.

PENN STATE IS MAKING PROGRESS

Coach Bezdek Has Line on Men for Niagara Game.

STATE COLLEGE, Pa., Sept. 21.—With a splendid record against teams in the New York State Small Colleges' Conference, Niagara University will come here a week from today to open the 1929 football season, the forty-third for Penn State. The Purple eleven of the Cataract City has won the conference championship for three years in a row and has not been defeated by a conference opponent in three seasons.

Sheldon Hecker, a graduate of Niagara two years ago, is starting his first season as coach. His assistant as line coach is Emmett O'Connell, captain and center on the 1927 Holy Cross Team.

Like Penn State, the Purple began practice on September 3 with about twenty regulars from last season in camp for the preseason drill. Three veterans in the back field form the basis of attack, Sneider, Bresnahan and McCarthy, the latter an all-around player who filled in at center and end as well as playing the back field last season. Veterans on the line are Griffith, tackle; Walsh, center, and McHugh and Lapan, ends.

1929 Grid Machine Greatly Improved.

While last year's record of the Purple against the bigger colleges, Cornell and New York University, is not imposing, reports from the camp indicate that the 1929 team will be considerably improved, with fleet backs and the forward pass threat the keynote on attack.

To match the array that the New York State visitors will bring, Coach Hugo Bezdek will pick from a score of experienced candidates for his starting lineup. While the lineup of various squads in the training camp scrimmages has given little indication of what the starting combination will be, and Bezdek is undecided on a number of positions, those who probably will be sent against Niagara are:

Quits Chasing Pigs To Chase a Pigskin

Minneapolis, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Opening of the football season brings only a slight change in the occupation of Bronko Nagurski, Minnesota's speedy giant—he stops chasing pigs and starts chasing the pigskin.

The versatile husky shagged after porkers in the south St. Paul stockyards all summer while learning the intricacies of hog buying. But a live pig isn't in it with the interest a football has for him, says the Bronk.

There is no knowing what place the big star will play this fall. Dr. Clarence Spears, Minnesota mentor, holds up his right hand and with great earnestness whispers, "I don't know."

Nagurski tackled his way to stardom in 1927 and was regarded as one of the Big Ten's brightest linemen. Then one day Spears put him in the hole left by Herb Joesting, all-American full back. The Bronk, who has remarkable speed, took to offensive charging like a duck to the border lakelands.

Now, Spears likes a strong line and has plenty of full back applicants. But he likes scores made by backs of the Bronk's driving power. And he says he doesn't know.

All of which is giving the Minnesota fan sector a busy time.

BO QUITS JOB.

Bo McMillan, former Center College luminary, discounts reports he will leave Kansas Aggies at the end of the season. He announces himself well satisfied with the coaching position.

REAL TRIPLE THREAT.

Pitt and Duke Are Taking October 5 Game Seriously

Panthers to Work Twice, Once Here, En Route to Game at Durham; Contest "Big" One for Both.

DURHAM, N. C., Sept. 21.—Pitt and Duke, opponents in the big stadium opener here October 5, are putting everything into the first game for both teams. Pitt had a week's start on the Blue Devils and Coach Jock Sutherland already has named his team and made his plans for the invasion of the South.

The Panthers will leave Pittsburgh Wednesday evening before the game and arrive in Washington early the next morning. A workout will be staged in Washington Thursday afternoon, probably on Georgetown's field.

The Panthers will leave Washington Thursday night and arrive in Durham Friday morning, but won't halt in the enemy's territory long, arranging to proceed at once to Chapel Hill, where the team will work out again and then rest until noon Saturday.

Pitt Taking Duke Game Seriously.

The players will not spend any time in Durham until the time of battle arrives. They will then come by bus direct to the stadium and ready to play.

Ordinarily in early season games not much time is spent in travel, the visiting team leaving the night before and getting to the scene of battle the morning of the game. But Pitt is taking Duke quite seriously and is preparing for the game as it would prepare for the last contest of the season.

Pitt starts out this season rated one of the best prospects in American football. Duke starts out rated the best team ever to take the field in Blue Devil colors. So this October 5 game is mighty important to both.

Friedman, Thorne Are Sure Of Berths.

Duke is not far enough along to name a line-up. Some of the line positions are about set now. Two have been made since the start, with Bert Friedman at center and Bob Thorne at guard.

It also has been certain since the start that Capt. Kistler and Nick Warren would be among the forwards, but just where the coaches don't know. Now it looks as if Kistler and Warren would be in end positions on the offense and that on the defense Kistler would be a tackle and Warren a guard.

Don Hyatt, sophomore end, is sure of a job. The other end may be Mel Peeler, a veteran who has displayed the best tackling on the practice field.

Bill Bryan, the big boy of the squad, probably will be the other tackle. The back field depends on the style of play decided upon for Pitt. Two back fields may see action that day.

By JOHN H. REITINGER,
(Associated Press Staff Writer.)

PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Many world's series games have stirred baseball, but for tenseness and fine bits of strategy the series of 1913, the last time those old rivals, the Giants and the Athletics, met, will long be remembered.

The Athletics won, four games to one. The sole contest captured by the Giants was a ten-inning affair in Philadelphia and was one of the most exciting played by these teams, which had met three times in the October classic.

The first game, played in New York, was won by the Athletics, 6 to 4, a circuit drive by Home Run Baker, with Eddie Collins on the runways, figuring largely in the result.

The incomparable Mathewson was on the pitching mound for New York in the second game, played in Philadelphia, and proved to be a heart-throbbing, ten-inning pitching duel between "Big Six" and Eddie Plank.

Great Pitching and Wonderful Fielding.

Great pitching and wonderful fielding saved both sides. Neither had scored a run in eight innings. New York had two on bases with one out in the ninth, but was unable to score. The A's in their half also had two men on, with no one out, and also failed. In this half Mathewson gave one of his greatest exhibitions of strategy, saving the game with the aid of the fine fielding of Wiltse.

With Strunk, a fast man, on third, and Barry on second, Jack Lapp hit to George Wiltse, the veteran pitcher, who was filling in at first for the suspended Merkle. Wiltse whipped a throw to McLean, cutting off Strunk at the plate.

The Athletics crowded around Connie Mack in an excited discussion regarding whether Eddie Plank should take his regular turn at bat or step aside for a pinch hitter.

There were cries of "Murphy" from all over the field, but Mack refused to send in Danny Murphy, a good hitter, and stood pat on his old friend Plank.

Anyway, Eddie also hit to Wiltse and Barry was run down in trying to score the winning run.

Lapp was on third and Plank on second and two men were down. The crowd tried to rattle the great Mathewson, but he calmly pitched to the batter—Eddie Murphy—who poked a weak grounder to the box and the game went into the tenth inning. In the extra round the Giants scored three runs and the A's none.

The last duel between Christy and Eddie came in the final game of the series. Plank stopped the Giants with two hits, his crossfire ball working with deadly effect. Matty allowed only six blows, but the A's won 3 to 1 to clinch the series.

These two master moundsmen sleep in their native soil of Pennsylvania, where they went to college and where they learned the game of baseball. Plank rests in historic Gettysburg; Mathewson among the sloping foothills of the Alleghenies.

Sothern's Stick Mark In M. A. Loop Is Beaten

Cumberland, Md., Sept. 21.—Johnny Byrnes led the Cumberland Middle Atlantic League Team in batting during the season just closed with an average of .331. George Durning was runner-up with .329, while others in the charmed circle were Benny Artigiani, .326; Dave Black, .325, and Donald Thomas, .323. Byrnes is to receive a handsome wrist watch from a local jeweler.

Donald Thomas, Cumberland center fielder, established a league record by stealing 62 bases. The record had been held by Art Rooney, of Wheeling, who stole 58 in 1925, the year the league was organized.

Freddie Lucas, left fielder for Charleroi, hung up three new records in the league. He batted .407 in 113 games. Dennis Sothern, of the Cumberland Colts, now with the Philadelphia Nationals, held the best average previously—.374 for 96 games. Lucas also made the best base-hit record with 178. Lucas' third record is in runs batted in—113 in the same number of contests.

GREENBRIER LISTS GOLF, NET PLAY

D. C. Colleges Invited to Enter Tennis Teams.

Special to The Washington Post.

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, W. Va., Sept. 21.—The three new tennis and golf tournaments which have been scheduled for the Greenbrier Golf and Tennis Club during the first three weeks in October are attracting the finest players in the East and promise to present the finest array of talent that the East has witnessed this year in successive competition.

The Middle Atlantic intercollegiate tennis tournament during the week of September 30 has already drawn the entries of many of the larger colleges in the district for the doubles and singles competition. This will be the first annual playing of this event, and the advance entry list indicates that this tournament will prove to be very popular among the schools of this section.

The University of Virginia, Washington and Lee University, University of West Virginia, Davis and Elkins College and a number of the smaller colleges have already notified the committee that they will send a team to the tournament. Several of the colleges in the Washington district and in Maryland are also expected to enter teams in the play.

D. C. Colleges Invited to Enter Teams.

C. Alphonso Smith, jr., captain of the University of Virginia tennis team and one of the best intercollegiate players in the country, and Fred Johns will represent the University of Virginia and will probably prove formidable. Davis and Elkins College, of Elkins, W. Va., is sending the West Virginia intercollegiate champion, Robert Brown, and Carl McDonald, Tygart Valley champion, to represent the school in the doubles and singles play.

The other schools in the district which have been invited for the intercollegiate tournament are Georgetown, Catholic University, George Washington University, Randolph-Macon, Roanoke College, University of Richmond, William and Mary, Bethany, Bluefield College, Brosdus, West Virginia Wesleyan, Virginia Military Institute, Virginia Polytechnic Institute, University of Kentucky, University of Georgia, Emory, St. John's College, Naval Academy, University of Maryland, Western Maryland, University of North Carolina, University of South Carolina, Lynchburgh College and Hampden-Sidney.

The week following the intercollegiate tennis tournament, the Greenbrier Golf and Tennis Club will hold the first annual playing of the Greenbrier autumn golf championship, while the third week of competition will present the first annual playing of the Greenbrier autumn tennis championships.

Dayton Outstanding In Valley Baseball

Harrisonburg, Va., Sept. 21.—As the curtain is rung down on the 1929 baseball season in the Shenandoah Valley to give the stage over to football, the Dayton Club stands as the outstanding diamond aggregation composed solely of home boys.

After winning the Rockingham County League pennant with a record performance of twenty straight victories without a defeat, the Dayton lads proceeded to knock off Weyers Cave, representing the Augusta County circuit, in a postseason series, three games to one. Staunton, pennant winners in the Augusta League, was unable to keep its all-star outfit intact for the annual bicounty series and gave Weyers Cave the privilege of representing the circuit in the series. As Weyers Cave was composed solely of local players, Valley fans hold that the postseason series represented a true test of the strength of Rockingham and Augusta counties.

STRONG OFFENSIVE.

Army has one of the best offensive combinations in the country in Cagle and Murrell. West Point rooters are looking for the latter to be an all-American this season.

MARSTERS COMES BACK.

BACK IN BACK FIELD.

Coach Spears, of Minnesota, plans to use Bronko Nagurski regularly at full back. The big Pole was shifted from back field to line last season, and did not show to good advantage at either position.

ARMY DRILLS FOR BOSTON U. OPENER

Weakness at Center Is Big Worry of Grid Coaches.

WEST POINT, N. Y., Sept. 21.—Reports from Boston University indicate that many veterans of last year's team will be in their line-up when they open the Army football season here on September 28 in picturesque Michie Stadium. Capt. "Biff" Jones is concentrating on developing attack plays and though he has an experienced back field, the Army line with the exception of Perry, is composed of reserves from last year and newcomers.

In the back field, Cagle, who last year was probably America's outstanding player, will lead the attack and early practice sessions indicate that he will have another great year. Murrell at full back, whose line plunging plays in practice have been consistent ground gainers, will be with Cagle, as well as O'Keefe, half back, and Gibner, the scrappy new Cadet quarter back.

Center Position Team's Big Weakness.

Army's weakness is in the line, four centers having been lost through graduation together with both regular guards and left tackle. New men are being developed, but the situation particularly at center is doubtful. Miller, who played tackle last year in several games, is at present the strongest contender for the position with Gordon, a guard last season, and Lazar, the former plebe center developing.

Tennis Outlook Dark As New Players Fail

New York, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Another tennis season has become pretty much a matter for the historians to deal with, leaving no particularly alluring prospects of an early return of American supremacy on the courts of the world.

It is not a bright picture in which a 36-year-old tennis machine stands out in bold relief against a background of young bloods whose potentialities have been weighed and found lacking in the qualities that are essential to gain world supremacy.

Just when the United States is seeking racqueters capable of wresting the Davis Cup from France, William T. Tilden II climaxes what he says is the close of his international career by regaining the national tennis crown that last adorned his head in 1925.

In accomplishing the feat for the seventh time in his great career, he diminished America's hopes for next years by demonstrating that his somewhat aged and lanky form still possesses the power to defeat the best young players of the Nation.

Donald Strachan, Frank Shields, John Van Ryn and John Doeg were forced to acknowledge Tilden as their master in his triumphal comeback on the grass-covered courts of Forest Hills.

George Lott and Wilmer Allison, who with Tilden, Van Ryn and Frank Hunter made the unsuccessful effort to wrest the Davis Cup from France this year, fell in earlier rounds, and Fritz Mercur bowed to Hunter in the semifinals.

14-Year-Old Tank Star Sets New Mark in Japan

Tokyo, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Young Japan continues to paddle its way to recognition in the world of swimming competition, building up a challenge to American aquatic supremacy.

Now it is a 14-year-old schoolboy from Shizuoka, Shozo Makino, making a bid for a place on the Olympic swimming team.

Vols' Small Grid Squad No Worry to Coach

Knoxville, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—The University of Tennessee's football squad this year probably will be the smallest in the Southern conference.

Only 30 men reported for fall practice, but Coach Bob Neyland says he is not worried.

His winning teams of the last three years all were recruited from remarkably low numbers of men.

And then his famous Hack and Mack combination would help to make any coach happy. Buddy Hackman and Eugene McEver, who did big things at half positions last year, are back this year.

LOSE 15 LETTER MEN.

Over at Villanova, one of the foremost Eastern schools last season, they are bemoaning the loss of 15 letter men. Coach Stuhldreyer's team faces a tough schedule.

North Carolina Gridders Working Out Under Cover

New Plays Being Learned for Opener Saturday Against Wake Forest; Two Good Sets of Back Fields Are Available.

Special to The Washington Post.

CHAPEL HILL, N. C., Sept. 21.—Sixty University of North Carolina candidates closed out their third week's practice and their first week's scrimmage this afternoon, and from every indication things are shaping up nicely for the Tar Heels.

The Tar Heels are to open against the untouted, un-press-agented Wake Forest "Mystery Team" of the North Carolina Big Five in Kenan Stadium here next Saturday.

Chuck Collins and his coaching partners, Bob Fetzler, Bill Cerney and Jim Ashmore, were barring all spectators this week as they scrimmaged the men and gave them the new plays for the year. Veterans—the coaches have a nice little nucleus of sixteen—filled Team A, and it seems the 1929 Carolina model will be a veteran one.

In the first-string back field were Pete Wyrick, heady little quarter; Yank Spaulding, third-year full back and fine at interference and on defense; Jimmy Ward, triple-threat half back, and Strud Nash, Tar Heel speed king.

The coaches have three back-field combinations working. The theory seems to be the old Notre Dame idea—to keep hurling in fast, fresh back fields.

The second back field, to tell the truth, is about as good as the first. Johnny Branch, diminutive quarter, was a sensation on last year's yearlings and is hailed as a second Stumpy Thomason. Henry House, full, is probably the squad's hardest driver. Jim Magner and Chuck Erickson, half backs, are both fast and elusive and fine passers and receivers.

The Tar Heels have been taking on new plays in large numbers this week. The rumor is that the coaches are planning to present a new and reorganized Notre Dame system against Wake Forest.

Tar Heels Will Face Eight Conference Foes.

The Tar Heels are to meet eight Conference opponents this season. From Tee to Green

Henry Litchfield West

Of all the things inanimate
In Nature's university,
I think that golf balls illustrate
The maximum perversity.

Whene'er a ball goes in the sand,
To show its real depravity,
It will invariably land
Deep in a heel-print cavity.

Its conduct when I go to play
Is really indefensible;
I hope the time will come some day
When golf balls will be sensible.

FOR many years the name of Robert T. Jones, jr., has been placed at the head of the list of Walker Cup team players. Apparently it was to remain there forever, as if it had been carved in enduring marble. It is now probable, although the matter has not been definitely determined, that American golfers will experience the shock of their lives by seeing Jones' name in second place. George Washington was first in war, first in peace and first in the hearts of his countrymen. Bobby Jones has been first in everything in the golfing world.

The possible shake-up is the result of the outcome of the recent national amateur championship. Harrison R. Johnston, the new amateur champion, is said to be entitled to the place of honor, with Jones relegated to second place. Johnston is not a flash in the pan. S. Davison Herron won the title in 1909 and then faded out of the picture, while in 1923 Max R. Marston became champion because he laid Sweetser a stymie on the thirty-eighth hole at Flossmoor, since which time he has never figured prominently in any major event. Johnston's history is entirely different. He has done valiant service in past years on the Walker Cup team, winning in his foursomes in 1923, 1924 and 1928. He was named only once for the singles, defeating Eustace Storey at Wheaton last year. This is a record which must be taken into consideration.

Jones Remains Greatest Golfer in Country.

Everybody knows that Jones, despite the fact that he was defeated in an 18-hole round at Pebble Beach, is the greatest golfer this country has ever known, and that even now he is the national open champion. The Walker Cup competition, however, is an amateur affair, and Johnston, by virtue of his recent victory, is the leading amateur at the present time.

The task of reaching this height was by no means easy, for he had to overcome such able competitors as Roland MacKenzie, George J. Voigt, Francis Ouimet and Dr. O. F. Willing. The precedent in his favor lies in the fact that in 1924 Max Marston was rated as No. 1 on the team, although at that time Jones had won the national open the previous year and had finished second at Oakland Hills earlier in the summer.

The Pebble Beach tournament played havoc with the previous line-up of the Walker Cup Team, for the United States Golf Association will undoubtedly be guided in its selection of the personnel for next year's contest by the story told in the score sheet of that event.

Evans Unlikely to Be on Team.

Charles Evans, jr., the familiar "Chick" of the olden days, would seem to be in the discard, and it is hardly probable that either Watts Gunn or Roland MacKenzie will be selected, notwithstanding the fact that the latter qualified at Pebble Beach and won a 20-hole battle over Storey. Chandler Egan, despite his marvelous rejuvenation at Pebble Beach, is perhaps a bit too old to be subjected to the strain of foreign competition. A champion 25 years ago, he was a semifinalist at Pebble Beach, but it is not too much to suggest that he has reached the climax of his career.

With Johnston and Jones in the first two places, Von Elm will probably be the third on the team. He is a master golfer, even though he has suffered three defeats in eighteen-hole rounds, and after winning the championship at Baltusrol he played magnificent medal golf at Olympia Fields and Winged Foot. Then will probably come Dr. Willing, who has not been on the team since 1924, but whose wonderful game insures him a high position on the team. Not only has he won every championship in the far Northwest, but he reached the final round at Pebble Beach, scoring a notable victory over England's menace, Cyril Tolley, the British amateur champion. He is a player of bulldog tenacity and never yields to an opponent until the last vestige of hope has disappeared.

Voigt Can Not Be Ignored in 1930.

Voigt has never yet been chosen for the Walker Cup Team, but he can not be ignored next year. His long string of victories have demonstrated his golfing caliber. Besides this, he was medalist and a semifinalist at Braeburn last year, with triumps over Sweetser and Willing to his credit. He was quarter-finalist at Pebble Beach, eliminating Vincent Dolp and Don Moe. All the golf writers at Pebble Beach were tremendously impressed with Voigt's golf. Jack Kofoed, who represented the New York Evening Post, is especially enthusiastic. He agrees with his fellow-writers that if it had not been for Johnston's lucky break, when his ball hit a tree and bounced to the pin, Voigt would have been a finalist. Voigt went farther at Pebble Beach than any metropolitan player and, according to Kofoed, "he is too good a player to be kept away from the national title indefinitely." Voigt will certainly be on the Walker Cup Team.

Sweetser May Be Selected.

Here, then, are five of the eight players who will be selected, not including the two substitutes who are generally carried along. The rest of the list is on the knees of the gods. Francis Ouimet probably, for, although he is not as young as he used to be, he beat the man who beat Bobby Jones. Sweetser may be selected for he is back on his game and is the only American besides Walter Travis to win the British amateur. Then possibly Maurice J. McCarthy, metropolitan and New Yok State amateur champion, who is a national titlist in the making. Or Johnny Goodman, perhaps.

One could go on indefinitely discussing the probable make-up of the Walker Cup Team, but speculation ceases at one point. All the hopes which California entertained of being represented on the team have vanished. The morning glories on the Pacific Coast have bloomed and faded. Johnny McHugh, Jack Neville, Gibson Dunlap, Lawson Little—all the golfers who were to rise to the topmost pinnacle of golfing fame, will not be mentioned when the Walker Cup Team is named.

Two Major Events For Week.

Two major events are scheduled for this week—the District amateur golf championship at the Congressional Club next Wednesday and Thursday, 72 holes medal play, and the national Army championship, which will begin next Tuesday on the course of the Army, Navy and Marine Corps Club. Miller B. Stevinson, of the Columbia Club, who won the District championship last year, will defend his title. The field is limited to players with a handicap of fourteen or less. The Army championship will consist of a qualifying round followed by match play and officers from all sections of the United States will compete.

Now that the Bannockburn fall invitation tournament is a thing of the past—and it was the most successful event in the history of the club—the attention of local golfers will be focused upon the invitation event at the Manor Club, which begins on October 2, with two days devoted to the qualifying round and with the final rounds in five sixteens on Saturday, October 5. There will be a golfers' dinner on Friday night, October 4, and as this is the first invitation tournament ever given by the club, it is proposed to stage a real party.

Manning Donates Silver Trophy.

J. Webster Manning, a member of the club, has donated a large and handsome solid silver trophy to remain permanently in the possession of the club, but which will bear the name of each year's winner. The latter, of course, will receive either a replica of the cup or a suitable prize. Ray F. Gerrity, chairman of the golf committee, has named a large number of aids to assist him in handling the event, as follows:

D. L. Thomson, Harris Collins, George F. Miller, H. L. Lacy, William H. Callahan, John Crockett, E. M. McClelland, G. J. Schoeneman, Charles W. Schafer, James G. Taylor, Albert Bouic, A. G. Landvoigt, E. B. Baxter, F. J. Newland, J. W. Bird, Max Walten, Eugene Cissell, James R. Pattison, Harry G. Pitt, William E. Richardson, William L. F. King, Dr. W. V. Conners, J. W. Manning, Ralph Jones, Fred W. Rade, Frank J. Ehlers, C. J. Storm, Stanley Willis, Wilson Barrett, George D. See, Winship I. Green, J. C Exner, Charles M. Wright, Frank Dunlop, Jerney E. Ebert and C. E. Bell.

Tilley Finds Birdie Is Not Birdie.

Dr. E. R. Tilley, J. W. Harvey, jr., and George Diffenbaugh, assistant professional, started out last week to play a round on the Indian Spring course, with the usual arrangement regarding bonuses for birdies and eagles.

"But," said Dr. Tilley, "a 3 on the seventh hole is not to be an eagle."

The seventh hole from the back tee is 450 yards and is a par 5, but from the front tee is only 422 yards and this distance is frequently negotiated in four strokes. When the hole was played by the trio from the front tee, Tilley was on the green in 2 and holed out in 2 putts for a 4.

"That is a birdie for me," said Tilley.

"Not on your life," chorused his two companions. "If 3 is not an eagle, 4 is not a birdie."

As it was a case of two against one, nothing was left for Tilley to do but walk over to the next tee.

Ely Turns in Second Hole-in-One.

The majority of golfers would be happily content with making a hole-in-one just once in a lifetime, but Selden M. Ely, supervising principal in the public schools, has two to his credit. He recently made his second hole-in-one on the Soldiers' Home course, playing with D. L. Pitcher, accountant at the home.

Randolph Hood, of the Washington Golf and Country Club, last week drove the first green, 305 yards. Did he make a birdie or an eagle? He did not. He took four putts and lost the hole.

Qualifying rounds will be played next Saturday and Sunday on the Indian Spring course by the women members in competition for the annual club championship. Match play will begin on the succeeding Monday morning and will continue for three days. The present champion is Mrs. Perry B. Hoover, who defeated Mrs. Warren L. Heap in the final round last year.

A handsome handicap board has been placed in the sun parlor of the Columbia Club. It contains approximately 450 names, stenciled in large letters on metal strips and arranged in alphabetical order on tall wooden panels. The array is quite imposing and the assignment of handicaps affords a constant topic for discussion among the members.

Pope Wins Senior Tournament.

The seniors' tournament at the Indian Spring Club last week, eighteen holes, match play against par, resulted in a victory for Homer S. Pope, 3 down. C. J. Matson, 4 down, was runner-up and Dr. Charles W. Cole, 5 down, finished in third place.

A new green is being constructed on the twelfth hole of the Chevy Chase course. It is situated directly in the rear of the present green, is unusually large and is banked to hold an approach shot. It is trapped on both sides. A second shot, after a long drive up the fairway, can be played with more strength and confidence than at present, and there is a general consensus of opinion that the new arrangement will greatly improve the hole.

Walter R. McCallum, of the Washington Golf and Country Club, last week created a new record for the course at Annapolis Roads. Starting with three birdies on the first four holes, he finished in 33 strokes. The previous record, 34, was held by Sidney C. Moore, assistant professional at the Congressional Club.

CLASS OF CENTERS.

Barratt, of Ohio State, already is being mentioned as a probable all-Conference center. He will be a tower of strength in the Buckeye line.

LAST CONFEDERATE CAPITAL DANVILLE

APRIL 10, 1865, WAS DATE

Special to The Washington Post.

Danville, Va., Sept. 21.—Discussion already has been started here in Confederate circles as a result of the State conservation commission's indicated purpose of avoiding reference to the last capital of the Confederacy in a highway marker to be placed on the lawn of Danville's Confederate memorial.

If the Confederate organizations have their way, the State's offer to place at Danville's disposal a marker at cost will be rejected and the city will place its own marker bearing a text prepared here and giving recognition to the local claim.

Mayor Harry Wooding, who was in Confederate service, says he is certain the claim can be authenticated.

Mrs. Barryman Green says the issue was raised 25 years ago, when she was president of the Ladies' Memorial Association, when proof sufficient to support the claim was made.

Joseph B. Anderson, former member of the Virginia House of Delegates, remembers Judah Benjamin, secretary of state, who, with other cabinet members, attended the last meeting with President Jefferson Davis. Benjamin, he says, carried the last proclamation to the local newspaper office to be set in type. Anderson, then a boy, was employed in the office.

"Mr. Benjamin came in," Anderson says, "with the copy of the proclamation, which was so interlineated with corrections made by President Davis that he insisted on sitting down and copying the whole message over again in order to be more legible to the printer."

According to Anderson, this took place April 10, 1865, the day after the surrender. On the following day Davis fled South by way of Greensboro, and members of the cabinet scattered and never met thereafter.

FIVE ARTISTS TO APPEAR IN GALA CONCERT

Five internationally famous artists —Sophie Braslau, contralto; Efrem Zimbalist, violinist; Anna Case, soprano; Hans Barth, pianist, and Cornelia Otis Skinner, impressionist— are all announced to appear under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene at a gala concert on Saturday evening, November 2, which will inaugurate the new Constitution Hall of the Daughters of the American Revolution as Washington's newest music hall and which will also usher in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's series of six Saturday evening concerts to be presented there during the coming season.

Through arrangements made with local authorities of the Daughters of the American Revolution, this gala performance will be the first public performance to be given in the new D. A. R. auditorium at Eighteenth and C streets northwest. It will also be, in all probability, the most pretentious evening concert ever given in Washington.

Among the interesting features of this performance will be the appearance of Miss Braslau and Miss Case not only as soloists but in a series of duets which promise a rare musical treat. Miss Braslau, whom the late James G. Huneker called "a gorgeous contralto," is an American artist who was firmly established in the United States before duplicating her American triumps in Europe, while Anna Case, one of the outstanding sopranos before the American public, is almost too well known to require comment.

Efrem Zimbalist, the violinist, is known all over the world, both as violinist and composer. A pupil of Leopold Auer, teacher of Heifetz, Zimbalist made his American debut in 1911 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Since that time he has played in practically every large city in the world and is the composer of an operetta, "Honeydew;" a "Suite in Old Form," for violin and piano; "Three Slavic Dances," a fantasy on the motives of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Coq d'Or," and many other works.

Cornelia Otis Skinner, whose fame as an interpreter of character rivals that of the world-famous Ruth Draper, is a daughter of the celebrated actor, Otis Skinner, and like her famous father, she chose the stage as a career though selecting a more liberal phase of that profession. Of captivating charm and beauty, Miss Skinner's character sketches, such as "Snowbound in Iowa," "On the Beach at Barbados" and "An American Girl on the French Telephone," are said to be veritable revelations of her art.

The fifth feature of this gala performance that Mrs. Wilson-Greene will present on November 2 will be Hans Barth, the pianist, in a recital that includes the use of three types of pianos—the harpsichord of long ago, the piano of today, and, thirdly, the new quarter-tone piano of two keyboards which promises to revolutionize piano technique.

This gala performance will be the first of a series of six evening concerts which will offer, in addition, Ethel Leginska and the Boston Women's Orchestra on December 11; Sigrid Onegin, the contralto, on January 11; Jascha Heifetz, the violinist, on January 25; Rosa Raisa, soprano, and Giacomo Rimini, both of the Chicago Opera Co., on February 8, and Mme. Louise Homer on March 8.

TOP RANK AS SHORTSTOP SEEN FOR JOE CRONIN

Poise Is Need Of Youthful Nat Star

Coast "Kid" Famous for Sensational Fielding.

"Hitting in Pinch" Big Factor in His Success.

By FRANK H. YOUNG.

TIME was when the American League boasted several brilliant shortstops, but a glance over the rosters of the eight teams shows that not only is there no outstanding star at present covering the territory between second and third but that there has been none since Roger Peckinpaugh and "Midget Joe" Sewell were in their prime.

Washington fans, who have seen Joe Cronin in action day in and day out, however, believe that he will be responsible for a change in this condition within the next year or two—and the dope indicates that they are right in their contention. The records show that the youthful Nat short fielder has made many errors this season—many too many—but they do not show how many of his assists were hit-robbery of enemy sharpshooters, due to the fact that he goes after everything and comes up with many balls that another would not even get close to.

It is an odd fact that many of Cronin's errors are on comparatively easy chances; in fact, his greatest fielding weakness seems to be on balls hit directly at him. There is no question, however, but what he can go as far to either side as any player in the business, being particularly good on his left, while the fact that he does not care about his average, but goes after everything, makes him an ideal type of player to have around.

Experts Say Joe Plays Too Far Back.

Some of the so-called experts claim that Joe ... his position too deeply, which greatly reduces his chances of throwing out runners on slow hit balls but, from the opposite angle, playing deep enables him to cover more territory, both for grounders and for Texas Leaguers. On the field, Cronin gives the impression of being nervous, for he fidgets about considerably and apparently does not know what to do with his hands, but his mates are authority for the statement that looks are deceiving and that Joe is as cool as a cucumber in the heat of battle.

Steadiness is something which comes from experience and which Cronin is bound to get ere long, and when he adds this to his natural ability and his fighting spirit, many believe that he will develop into the best shortstop of recent years.

Although Cronin saw service for an entire season with the Pittsburgh Pirates—the word "saw" being used advisedly, for he spent most of the year sitting on the bench watching games—he has just turned 22, which means that his best years are just ahead of him. His case, like that of so many other players in baseball, is one of contradiction.

When Scout Joe Engel uncovered Cronin with the Kansas City American Association team last year, he reported that his find looked like a great future fielding prospect, but could not hit. When Cronin reported here during the fag-end of the season, Bucky Harris, then manager, immediately started him at shortstop and he filled that position during that period when the Nationals staged their final spurt, which showed them traveling faster than any club in the league.

Opposing Pitchers Respect Cronin.

While Engel's statement that Cronin could not hit was borne out by the averages, for his stick mark was a puny .243, a closer glance at the figures shows that the comparatively few hits which he did make came at timely moments and that his blows were responsible for 25 runs. This season, however, Cronin is not held lightly by opposing pitchers.

Right now he is hitting around the .275 mark, and that he is improving steadily is proven by his extra-base-blow record, which shows that he has pounded out seven home runs, nine triples and twenty-four doubles.

The "San Francisco Kid," as his mates call him, is an ideal type of athlete, who takes his work seriously. The strides he has made since coming here last year have been great. And, if he continues to improve in the future as he has in the recent past, there is no question but what he may rank with the top-notchers next year, or surely in 1931.

Thirty-nine aspirants for the freshmen football team at the University of Maryland are toiling under the direction of Jack Faber, head coach and 16 of them are former Washington high school students. However, three of the Capital boys and seven others never played the grid game in high school.

Washington youths with grid experience with the Old Line yearlings are: Daniel Galotta, end, Tech-Emerson; Doriance Kelly, end, Eastern; William Wood, end and back, Eastern; Joseph Lucas, end, St. John's; Edward Molenof, guard, Eastern; George Cole, tackle, Tech; Robert McMillin, guard, Western; Harold Norwood, back, Tech; Fred Stelzer, back, Tech; Donald Imiria, back, Western-Devitt; Carl Pfau, back, Tech; Lawrence Plumley, back, Central; Ernest Fountain, back, Tech.

There are only four players in Faber's aggregation who tip the scales at more than 170 pounds and the squad averages just about 160 to the man. The average age is under 19 years.

Faber is being aided by Knobby Thomas, of Washington, and Gus Crothers, former Old Line athletic stars.

NOW A COACH.

PENN STATE IS MAKING PROGRESS

STATE COLLEGE, Pa., Sept. 21.—With a splendid record against teams in the New York State Small Colleges' Conference, Niagara University will come here a week from today to open the 1929 football season, the forty-third for Penn State. The Purple eleven of the Cataract City has won the conference championship for three years in a row and has not been defeated by a conference opponent in three seasons.

Sheldon Hecker, a graduate of Niagara two years ago, is starting his first season as coach. His assistant, as line coach is Emmett O'Connell, captain and center on the 1927 Holy Cross Team.

Like Penn State, the Purple began practice on September 3 with about twenty regulars from last season in camp for the preseason drill. Three veterans in the back field form the basis of attack, Sneider, Bresnahan and McCarthy, the latter an all-around player who filled in at center and end as well as playing the back field last season. Veterans on the line are Griffith, tackle; Walsh, center, and McHugh and Lapan, ends.

1929 Grid Machine Greatly Improved.

While last year's record of the Purple against the bigger colleges, Cornell and New York University, is not imposing, reports from the camp indicate that the 1929 team will be considerably improved, with fleet backs and the forward pass threat the keynote on attack.

To match the array that the New York State visitors will bring, Coach Hugo Bezdek will pick from a score of experienced candidates for his starting lineup. While the lineup of various squads in the training camp scrimmages has given little indication of what the starting combination will be, and Bezdek is undecided on a number of positions, those who probably will be sent against Niagara are:

Quits Chasing Pigs To Chase a Pigskin

Minneapolis, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Opening of the football season brings only a slight change in the occupation of Bronko Nagurski, Minnesota's speedy giant—he stops chasing pigs and starts chasing the pigskin.

The versatile husky shagged after porkers in the south St. Paul stockyards all summer while learning the intricacies of hog buying. But a live pig isn't in it with the interest a football has for him, says the Bronk.

There is no knowing what place the big star will play this fall. Dr. Clarence Spears, Minnesota mentor, holds up his right hand and with great earnestness whispers, "I don't know."

Nagurski tackled his way to stardom in 1927 and was regarded as one of the Big Ten's brightest linemen. Then one day Spears put him in the hole left by Herb Joesting, all-American full back. The Bronk, who has remarkable speed, took to offensive charging like a duck to the border lakelands.

Now, Spears likes a strong line and has plenty of full back applicants. But he likes scores made by backs of the Bronk's driving power. And he says he doesn't know.

All of which is giving the Minnesota fan sector a busy time.

BO QUITS JOB.

Bo McMillan, former Center College luminary, discounts reports he will leave Kansas Aggies at the end of the season. He announces himself well satisfied with the coaching position.

REAL TRIPLE THREAT.

Pitt and Duke Are Taking October 5 Game Seriously

Panthers to Work Twice, Once Here, En Route to Game at Durham; Contest "Big" One for Both.

DURHAM, N. C., Sept. 21.—Pitt and Duke, opponents in the big stadium opener here October 5, are putting everything into the first game for both teams. Pitt had a week's start on the Blue Devils and Coach Jock Sutherland already has named his team and made his plans for the invasion of the South.

The Panthers will leave Pittsburgh Wednesday evening before the game and arrive in Washington early the next morning. A workout will be staged in Washington Thursday afternoon, probably on Georgetown's field.

The Panthers will leave Washington Thursday night and arrive in Durham Friday morning, but won't halt in the enemy's territory long, arranging to proceed at once to Chapel Hill, where the team will work out again and then rest until noon Saturday.

Pitt Taking Duke Game Seriously.

The players will not spend any time in Durham until the time of battle arrives. They will then come by bus direct to the stadium and ready to play.

Ordinarily in early season games not much time is spent in travel, the visiting team leaving the night before and getting to the scene of battle the morning of the game. But Pitt is taking Duke quite seriously and is preparing for the game as it would prepare for the last contest of the season.

Pitt starts out this season rated one of the best prospects in American football. Duke starts out rated the best team ever to take the field in Blue Devil colors. So this October 5 game is mighty important to both.

Friedman, Thorne Are Sure Of Berths.

Duke is not far enough along to name a line-up. Some of the line positions are about set now. Two have been made since the start, with Bert Friedman at center and Bob Thorne at guard.

It also has been certain since the start that Capt. Kistler and Nick Warren would be among the forwards, but just where the coaches don't know. Now it looks as if Kistler and Warren would be in end positions on the offense and that on the defense Kistler would be a tackle and Warren a guard.

Don Hyatt, sophomore end, is sure of a job. The other end may be Mel Peeler, a veteran who has displayed the best tackling on the practice field.

Bill Bryan, the big boy of the squad, probably will be the other tackle. The back field depends on the style of play decided upon for Pitt. Two back fields may see section that day.

Battles of Matty and Plank Stirred Fans in 1913 Series

By JOHN H. REITINGER.
(Associated Press Staff Writer.)

PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Many world's series games have stirred baseball, but for tenseness and fine bits of strategy the series of 1913, the last time those old rivals, the Giants and the Athletics, met, will long be remembered.

The Athletics won four games to one. The sole contest captured by the Giants was a ten-inning affair in Philadelphia and was one of the most exciting played by these teams, which had met three times in the October classic.

The first game, played in New York, was won by the Athletics, 6 to 4, a circuit drive by Home Run Baker, with Eddie Collins on the runways, figuring largely in the result.

The incomparable Mathewson was on the pitching mound for New York in the second game, played in Philadelphia, and proved to be a heart-throbbing, ten-inning pitching duel between "Big Six" and Eddie Plank.

Great Pitching and Wonderful Fielding.

Great pitching and wonderful fielding saved both sides. Neither had scored a run in eight innings. New York had two on bases with one out in the ninth, but was unable to score. The A's in their half also had two men on, with no one out, and also failed. In this half Mathewson gave one of his greatest exhibitions of strategy, saving the game with the aid of the fine fielding of Wiltse.

With Strunk, a fast man, on third, and Barry on second, Jack Lapp hit to George Wiltse, the veteran pitcher, who was filling in at first for the suspended Merkle. Wiltse whipped a throw to McLean, cutting off Strunk at the plate.

The Athletics crowded around Connie Mack in an excited discussion regarding whether Eddie Plank should take his regular turn at bat or step aside for a pinch hitter.

There were cries of "Murphy" from all over the field, but Mack refused to send in Danny Murphy, a good hitter, and stood pat on his old friend Plank.

Anyway, Eddie also hit to Wiltse and Barry was run down in trying to score the winning run.

Lapp was on third and Plank on second and two men were down. The crowd tried to rattle the great Mathewson, but he calmly pitched to the batter—Eddie Murphy—who poked a weak grounder to the box and the game went into the tenth inning. In the extra round the Giants scored three runs and the A's none.

The last duel between Christy and Eddie came in the final game of the series. Plank stopped the Giants with two hits, his crossfire ball working with deadly effect. Matty allowed only six blows, but the A's won 3 to 1 to clinch the series.

These two master moundsmen sleep in their native soil of Pennsylvania, where they went to college and where they learned the game of baseball. Plank rests in historic Gettysburg; Mathewson among the sloping foothills of the Alleghenies.

Sothern's Stick Mark In M. A. Loop Is Beaten

Cumberland, Md., Sept. 21.—Johnny Byrnes led the Cumberland Middle Atlantic League Team in batting during the season just closed with an average of .331. George Durning was runner-up with .329, while others in the charmed circle were Benny Artigiani, .326; Dave Black, .325, and Donald Thomas, .323. Byrnes is to receive a handsome wrist watch from a local jeweler.

Donald Thomas, Cumberland center fielder, established a league record by stealing 62 bases. The record had been held by Art Rooney, of Wheeling, who stole 58 in 1925, the year the league was organized.

Freddie Lucas, left fielder for Charleroi, hung up three new records in the league. He batted .407 in 113 games. Dennis Sothern, of the Cumberland Colts, now with the Philadelphia Nationals, held the best average previously—.374 for 96 games. Lucas also made the best base-hit record with 178. Lucas' third record is in runs batted in—113 in the same number of contests.

GREENBRIER LISTS GOLF, NET PLAY

D. C. Colleges Invited to Enter Tennis Teams.

Special to The Washington Post.

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, W. Va., Sept. 21.—The three new tennis and golf tournaments which have been scheduled for the Greenbrier Golf and Tennis Club during the first three weeks in October are attracting the finest players in the East and promise to present the finest array of talent that the East has witnessed this year in successive competition.

The Middle Atlantic intercollegiate tennis tournament during the week of September 30 has already drawn the entries of many of the larger colleges in the district for the doubles and singles competition. This will be the first annual playing of this event, and the advance entry list indicates that this tournament will prove to be very popular among the schools of this section.

The University of Virginia, Washington and Lee University, University of West Virginia, Davis and Elkins College and a number of the smaller colleges have already notified the committee that they will send a team to the tournament. Several of the colleges in the Washington district and in Maryland are also expected to enter teams in the play.

D. C. Colleges Invited to Enter Teams.

C. Alphonso Smith, jr., captain of the University of Virginia tennis team and one of the best intercollegiate players in the country, and Fred Johns will represent the University of Virginia and will probably prove formidable. Davis and Elkins College, of Elkins, W. Va., is sending the West Virginia intercollegiate champion, Robert Brown, and Carl McDonald, Tygart Valley champion, to represent the school in the doubles and singles play.

The other schools in the district which have been invited for the intercollegiate tournament are Georgetown, Catholic University, George Washington University, Randolph-Macon, Roanoke College, University of Richmond, William and Mary, Bethany, Bluefield College, Broadus, West Virginia Wesleyan, Virginia Military Institute, Virginia Polytechnic Institute, University of Kentucky, University of Georgia, Emory, St. John's College, Naval Academy, University of Maryland, Western Maryland, University of North Carolina, University of South Carolina, Lynchburg College and Hampden-Sidney.

The week following the intercollegiate tennis tournament, the Greenbrier Golf and Tennis Club will hold the first annual playing of the Greenbrier autumn golf championship, while the third week of competition will present the first annual playing of the Greenbrier autumn tennis championships.

Dayton Outstanding In Valley Baseball

Harrisonburg, Va., Sept. 21.—As the curtain is rung down on the 1929 baseball season in the Shenandoah Valley to give the stage over to football, the Dayton Club stands as the outstanding diamond aggregation composed solely of home boys.

After winning the Rockingham County League pennant with a record performance of twenty straight victories without a defeat, the Dayton lads proceeded to knock off Weyers Cave, representing the Augusta County circuit, in a postseason series, three games to one. Staunton, pennant winners in the Augusta League, was unable to keep its all-star outfit intact for the annual bicounty series and gave Weyers Cave the privilege of representing the circuit in the series. As Weyers Cave was composed solely of local players, Valley fans hold that the postseason series represented a true test of the strength of Rockingham and Augusta counties.

STRONG OFFENSIVE.

Army has one of the best offensive combinations in the country in Cagle and Murrell. West Point rooters are looking for the latter to be an all-American this season.

MARSTERS COMES BACK.

BACK IN BACK FIELD.

Coach Spears, of Minnesota, plans to use Bronko Nagurski regularly at full back. The big Pole was shifted from back field to line last season, and did not show to good advantage at either position.

ARMY DRILLS FOR BOSTON U. OPENER

Weakness at Center Is Big Worry of Grid Coaches.

WEST POINT, N. Y., Sept. 21.—Reports from Boston University indicate that many veterans of last year's team will be in their line-up when they open the Army football season here on September 28 in picturesque Michie Stadium. Capt. "Biff" Jones is concentrating on developing attack plays and though he has an experienced back field, the Army line with the exception of Perry, is composed of reserves from last year and newcomers.

In the back field, Cagle, who last year was probably America's outstanding player, will lead the attack and early practice sessions indicate that he will have another great year. Murrell at full back, whose line plunging plays in practice have been consistent ground gainers, will be with Cagle, as well as O'Keefe, half back, and Gibner, the scrappy new Cadet quarter back.

Center Position Team's Big Weakness.

Army's weakness is in the line, four centers having been lost through graduation together with both regular guards and left tackle. New men are being developed, but the situation particularly at center is doubtful. Miller, who played tackle last year in several games, is at present the strongest contender for the position with Gordon, a guard last season, and Lazar, the former plebe center developing.

Tennis Outlook Dark As New Players Fail

New York, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Another tennis season has become pretty much a matter for the historians to deal with, leaving no particularly alluring prospects of an early return of American supremacy on the courts of the world.

It is not a bright picture in which a 36-year-old tennis machine stands out in bold relief against a background of young bloods whose potentialities have been weighed and found lacking in the qualities that are essential to gain world supremacy.

Just when the United States is seeking racqueters capable of wresting the Davis Cup from France, William T. Tilden II climaxes what he says is the close of his international career by regaining the national tennis crown that last adorned his head in 1925.

In accomplishing the feat for the seventh time in his great career, he diminished America's hopes for next years by demonstrating that his somewhat aged and lanky form still possesses the power to defeat the best young players of the Nation.

Donald Strachan, Frank Shields, John Van Ryn and John Doeg were forced to acknowledge Tilden as their master in his triumphal comeback on the grass-covered courts of Forest Hills.

George Lott and Wilmer Allison, who with Tilden, Van Ryn and Frank Hunter made the unsuccessful effort to wrest the Davis Cup from France this year, fell in earlier rounds, and Fritz Mercur bowed to Hunter in the semifinals.

Tokyo, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Young Japan continues to paddle its way to recognition in the world of swimming competition, building up a challenge to American aquatic supremacy.

Now it is a 14-year-old schoolboy from Shizuoka, Shozo Makino, making a bid for a place on the Olympic swimming team.

Vols' Small Grid Squad No Worry to Coach

Knoxville, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—The University of Tennessee's football squad this year probably will be the smallest in the Southern conference.

Only 30 men reported for fall practice, but Coach Bob Neyland says he is not worried.

His winning teams of the last three years all were recruited from remarkably low numbers of men.

And then his famous Hack and Mack combination would help to make any coach happy. Buddy Hackman and Eugene McEver, who did big things at half positions last year, are back this year.

LOSE 15 LETTER MEN.

Over at Villanova, one of the foremost Eastern schools last season, they are bemoaning the loss of 15 letter men. Coach Stuhldreyer's team faces a tough schedule.

North Carolina Gridders Working Out Under Cover

New Plays Being Learned for Opener Saturday Against Wake Forest; Two Good Sets of Back Fields Are Available.

Special to The Washington Post.

CHAPEL HILL, N. C., Sept. 21.—Sixty University of North Carolina candidates closed out their third week's practice and their first week's scrimmage this afternoon, and from every indication things are shaping up nicely for the Tar Heels.

The Tar Heels are to open against the untouted, un-press-agented Wake Forest "Mystery Team" of the North Carolina Big Five in Kenan Stadium here next Saturday.

Chuck Collins and his coaching partners, Bob Fetzler, Bill Cerney and Jim Ashmore, were barring all spectators this week as they scrimmaged the men and gave them the new plays for the year. Veterans—the coaches have a nice little nucleus of sixteen—filled Team A, and it seems the 1929 Carolina model will be a veteran one.

In the first-string back field were Pete Wyrick, heady little quarter; Yank Spaulding, third-year full back and fine at interference and on defense; Jimmy Ward, triple-threat half back, and Strud Nash, Tar Heel speed king.

The coaches have three back-field combinations working. The theory seems to be the old Notre Dame idea—to keep hurling in fast, fresh back fields.

The second back field, to tell the truth, is about as good as the first. Johnny Branch, diminutive quarter, was a sensation on last year's yearlings and is hailed as a second Stumpy Thomason. Henry House, full, is probably the squad's hardest driver. Jim Magner and Chuck Erickson, half backs, are both fast and elusive and fine passers and receivers.

The Tar Heels have been taking on new plays in large numbers this week. The rumor is that the coaches are planning to present a new and reorganized Notre Dame system against Wake Forest.

Tar Heels Will Face Eight Conference Foes.

The Tar Heels are to meet eight Conference opponents this season. Following the Wake Forest game next week, the team will move on to College Park the next week-end, where Maryland is to be met October 5. Then the Tar Heels will take a jaunt to Atlanta to meet Georgia Tech the following week-end. The Carolina-Tech game is to be played Friday, October 11, preceding by one day the Georgia-Yale game to be played in the new Georgia bowl at Athens. The remainder of the Tar Heel schedule calls for games with V. P. I. at Chapel Hill October 26, North Carolina State at Chapel Hill November 2, South Carolina at Columbia November 9, Davidson at Davidson November 16, Virginia at Chapel Hill Thanksgiving Day, and Duke at Durham December 7.

From Tee to Green

Henry Litchfield West

Of all the things inanimate
In Nature's university,
I think that golf balls illustrate
The maximum perversity.

Whene'er a ball goes in the sand,
To show its real depravity,
It will invariably land
Deep in a heel-print cavity.

Its conduct when I go to play
Is really indefensible;
I hope the time will come some day
When golf balls will be sensible.

FOR many years the name of Robert T. Jones, jr., has been placed at the head of the list of Walker Cup team players. Apparently it was to remain there forever, as if it had been carved in enduring marble. It is now probable, although the matter has not been definitely determined, that American golfers will experience the shock of their lives by seeing Jones' name in second place. George Washington was first in war, first in peace and first in the hearts of his countrymen. Bobby Jones has been first in everything in the golfing world.

The possible shake-up is the result of the outcome of the recent national amateur championship. Harrison R. Johnston, the new amateur champion, is said to be entitled to the place of honor, with Jones relegated to second place. Johnston is not a flash in the pan. S. Davison Herron won the title in 1909 and then faded out of the picture, while in 1923 Max R. Marston became champion because he laid Sweetser a stymie on the thirty-eighth hole at Flossmoor, since which time he has never figured prominently in any major event. Johnston's history is entirely different. He has done valiant service in past years on the Walker Cup team, winning in his foursomes in 1923, 1924 and 1928. He was named only once for the singles, defeating Eustace Storey at Wheaton last year. This is a record which must be taken into consideration.

Jones Remains Greatest Golfer in Country.

Everybody knows that Jones, despite the fact that he was defeated in an 18-hole round at Pebble Beach, is the greatest golfer this country has ever known, and that even now he is the national open champion. The Walker Cup competition, however, is an amateur affair, and Johnston, by virtue of his recent victory, is the leading amateur at the present time.

The task of reaching this height was by no means easy, for he had to overcome such able competitors as Roland MacKenzie, George J. Voigt, Francis Ouimet and Dr. O. F. Willing. The precedent in his favor lies in the fact that in 1924 Max Marston was rated as No. 1 on the team, although at that time Jones had won the national open the previous year and had finished second at Oakland Hills earlier in the summer.

The Pebble Beach tournament played havoc with the previous line-up of the Walker Cup Team, for the United States Golf Association will undoubtedly be guided in its selection of the personnel for next year's contest by the story told in the score sheet of that event.

Evans Unlikely to Be on Team.

Charles Evans, jr., the familiar "Chick" of the olden days, would seem to be in the discard, and it is hardly probable that either Watts Gunn or Roland MacKenzie will be selected, notwithstanding the fact that the latter qualified at Pebble Beach and won a 20-hole battle over Storey. Chandler Egan, despite his marvelous rejuvenation at Pebble Beach, is perhaps a bit too old to be subjected to the strain of foreign competition. A champion 25 years ago, he was a semifinalist at Pebble Beach, but it is not too much to suggest that he has reached the climax of his career.

With Johnston and Jones in the first two places, Von Elm will probably be the third on the team. He is a master golfer, even though he has suffered three defeats in eighteen-hole rounds, and after winning the championship at Baltusrol he played magnificent medal golf at Olympia Fields and Winged Foot. Then will probably come Dr. Willing, who has not been on the team since 1924, but whose wonderful game insures him a high position on the team. Not only has he won every championship in the far Northwest, but he reached the final round at Pebble Beach, scoring a notable victory over England's menace, Cyril Tolley, the British amateur champion. He is a player of bulldog tenacity and never yields to an opponent until the last vestige of hope has disappeared.

Voigt Can Not Be Ignored in 1930.

Voigt has never yet been chosen for the Walker Cup Team, but he can not be ignored next year. His long string of victories have demonstrated his golfing caliber. Besides this, he was medalist and a semifinalist at Braeburn last year, with triumps over Sweetser and Willing to his credit. He was quarter-finalist at Pebble Beach, eliminating Vincent Dolp and Don Moe. All the golf writers at Pebble Beach were tremendously impressed with Voigt's golf. Jack Kofoed, who represented the New York Evening Post, is especially enthusiastic. He agrees with his fellow-writers that if it had not been for Johnston's lucky break, when his ball hit a tree and bounced to the pin, Voigt would have been a finalist. Voigt went farther at Pebble Beach than any metropolitan player and, according to Kofoed, "he is too good a player to be kept away from the national title indefinitely." Voigt will certainly be on the Walker Cup Team.

Sweetser May Be Selected.

Here, then, are five of the eight players who will be selected, not including the two substitutes who are generally carried along. The rest of the list is on the knees of the gods. Francis Ouimet probably, for, although he is not as young as he used to be, he beat the man who beat Bobby Jones. Sweetser may be selected for he is back on his game and is the only American besides Walter Travis to win the British amateur. Then possibly Maurice J. McCarthy, metropolitan and New York State amateur champion, who is a national titlist in the making. Or Johnny Goodman, perhaps.

One could go on indefinitely discussing the probable make-up of the Walker Cup Team, but speculation ceases at one point. All the hopes which California entertained of being represented on the team have vanished. The morning glories on the Pacific Coast have bloomed and faded. Johnny McHugh, Jack Neville, Gibson Dunlap, Lawson Little—all the golfers who were to rise to the topmost pinnacle of golfing fame, will not be mentioned when the Walker Cup Team is named.

Two Major Events For Week.

Two major events are scheduled for this week—the District amateur golf championship at the Congressional Club next Wednesday and Thursday, 72 holes medal play, and the national Army championship, which will begin next Tuesday on the course of the Army, Navy and Marine Corps Club. Miller B. Stevinson, of the Columbia Club, who won the District championship last year, will defend his title. The field is limited to players with a handicap of fourteen or less. The Army championship will consist of a qualifying round followed by match play and officers from all sections of the United States will compete.

Now that the Bannockburn fall invitation tournament is a thing of the past—and it was the most successful event in the history of the club—the attention of local golfers will be focused upon the invitation event at the Manor Club, which begins on October 2, with two days devoted to the qualifying round and with the final rounds in five sixteens on Saturday, October 5. There will be a golfers' dinner on Friday night, October 4, and as this is the first invitation tournament ever given by the club, it is proposed to stage a real party.

Manning Donates Silver Trophy.

J. Webster Manning, a member of the club, has donated a large and handsome solid silver trophy to remain permanently in the possession of the club, but which will bear the name of each year's winner. The latter, of course, will receive either a replica of the cup or a suitable prize. Ray P. Garrity, chairman of the golf committee, has named a large number of aids to assist him in handling the event, as follows:

D. L. Thomson, Harris Collins, George F. Miller, H. L. Lacy, William H. Callahan, John Crockett, E. M. McClelland, G. J. Schoenemen, Charles W. Schafer, James G. Taylor, Albert Boulc, A. G. Landvoigt, E. B. Baxter, F. J. Newland, J. W. Bird, Max Walten, Eugene Cissell, James R. Pattison, Harry G. Pitt, William E. Richardson, William L. F. King, Dr. W. V. Conners, J. W. Manning, Ralph Jones, Fred W. Rade, Frank J. Ehlers, C. J. Storm, Stanley Willis, Wilson Barrett, George D. See, Winship I. Green, J. C Exner, Charles M. Wright, Frank Dunlop, Jerney S. Ebert and C. E. Bell.

Tilley Finds Birdie Is Not Birdie.

Dr. E. B. Tilley, J. W. Harvey, jr., and George Diffenbaugh, assistant professional, started out last week to play a round on the Indian Spring course, with the usual arrangement regarding bonuses for birdies and eagles.

"But," said Dr. Tilley, "a 3 on the seventh hole is not to be an eagle."

The seventh hole from the back tee is 450 yards and is a par 5, but from the front tee is only 422 yards and this distance is frequently negotiated in four strokes. When the hole was played by the trio from the front tee, Tilley was on the green in 2 and holed out in 2 putts for a 4.

"That is a birdie for me," said Tilley.

"Not on your life," chorused his two companions. "If 3 is not an eagle, 4 is not a birdie."

As it was a case of two against one, nothing was left for Tilley to do but walk over to the next tee.

Ely Turns in Second Hole-in-One.

The majority of golfers would be happily content with making a hole-in-one just once in a lifetime, but Selden M. Ely, supervising principal in the public schools, has two to his credit. He recently made his second hole-in-one on the Soldiers' Home course, playing with D. L. Pitcher, accountant at the home.

Randolph Hood, of the Washington Golf and Country Club, last week drove the first green, 305 yards. Did he make a birdie or an eagle? He did not. He took four putts and lost the hole.

Qualifying rounds will be played next Saturday and Sunday on the Indian Spring course by the women members in competition for the annual club championship. Match play will begin on the succeeding Monday morning and will continue for three days. The present champion is Mrs. Perry B. Hoover, who defeated Mrs. Warren L. Heap in the final round last year.

A handsome handicap board has been placed in the sun parlor of the Columbia Club. It contains approximately 450 names, stenciled in large letters on metal strips and arranged in alphabetical order on tall wooden panels. The array is quite imposing and the assignment of handicaps affords a constant topic for discussion among the members.

Pope Wins Senior Tournament.

The seniors' tournament at the Indian Spring Club last week, eighteen holes, match play against par, resulted in a victory for Homer S. Pope, 3 down. C. J. Matson, 4 down, was runner-up and Dr. Charles W. Cole, 5 down, finished in third place.

A new green is being constructed on the twelfth hole of the Chevy Chase course. It is situated directly in the rear of the present green, is unusually large and is banked to hold an approach shot. It is trapped on both sides. A second shot, after a long drive up the fairway, can be played with more strength and confidence than at present, and there is a general consensus of opinion that the new arrangement will greatly improve the hole.

Walter R. McCallum, of the Washington Golf and Country Club, last week created a new record for the course at Annapolis Roads. Starting with three birdies on the first four holes, he finished in 33 strokes. The previous record, 34, was held by Sidney C. Moore, assistant professional at the Congressional Club.

CLASS OF CENTERS.

Barratt, of Ohio State, already is being mentioned as a probable all-Conference center. He will be a tower of strength in the Buckeye line.

LAST CONFEDERATE CAPITAL DANVILLE

APRIL 10, 1865, WAS DATE

Special to The Washington Post.

Danville, Va., Sept. 21.—Discussion already has been started here in Confederate circles as a result of the State conservation commission's indicated purpose of avoiding reference to the last capital of the Confederacy in a highway marker to be placed on the lawn of Danville's Confederate memorial.

If the Confederate organizations have their way, the State's offer to place at Danville's disposal a marker at cost will be rejected and the city will place its own marker bearing a text prepared here and giving recognition to the local claim.

Mayor Harry Wooding, who was in Confederate service, says he is certain the claim can be authenticated.

Mrs. Barryman Green says the issue was raised 25 years ago, when she was president of the Ladies' Memorial Association, when proof sufficient to support the claim was made.

Joseph B. Anderson, former member of the Virginia House of Delegates, remembers Judah Benjamin, secretary of state, who, with other cabinet members, attended the last meeting with President Jefferson Davis. Benjamin, he says, carried the last proclamation to the local newspaper office to be set in type. Anderson, then a boy, was employed in the office.

"Mr. Benjamin came in," Anderson says, "with the copy of the proclamation, which was so interlineated with corrections made by President Davis that he insisted on sitting down and copying the whole message over again in order to be more legible to the printer."

According to Anderson, this took place April 10, 1865, the day after the surrender. On the following day Davis fled South by way of Greensboro, and members of the cabinet scattered and never met thereafter.

FIVE ARTISTS TO APPEAR IN GALA CONCERT

Five internationally famous artists —Sophie Braslau, contralto; Efrem Zimbalist, violinist; Anna Case, soprano; Hans Barth, pianist, and Cornelia Otis Skinner, impressionist— are all announced to appear under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene at a gala concert on Saturday evening, November 2, which will inaugurate the new Constitution Hall of the Daughters of the American Revolution as Washington's newest music hall and which will also usher in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's series of six Saturday evening concerts to be presented there during the coming season.

Through arrangements made with local authorities of the Daughters of the American Revolution, this gala performance will be the first public performance to be given in the new D. A. R. auditorium at Eighteenth and C streets northwest. It will also be, in all probability, the most pretentious evening concert ever given in Washington.

Among the interesting features of this performance will be the appearance of Miss Braslau and Miss Case not only as soloists but in a series of duets which promise a rare musical treat. Miss Braslau, whom the late James G. Huneker called "a gorgeous contralto," is an American artist who was firmly established in the United States before duplicating her American triumps in Europe, while Anna Case, one of the outstanding sopranos before the American public, is almost too well known to require comment.

Efrem Zimbalist, the violinist, is known all over the world, both as violinist and composer. A pupil of Leopold Auer, teacher of Heifetz, Zimbalist made his American debut in 1911 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Since that time he has played in practically every large city in the world and is the composer of an operetta, "Honeydew;" a "Suite in Old Form," for violin and piano; "Three Slavic Dances," a fantasy on the motives of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Coq d'Or," and many other works.

Cornelia Otis Skinner, whose fame as an interpreter of character rivals that of the world-famous Ruth Draper, is a daughter of the celebrated actor, Otis Skinner, and like her famous father, she chose the stage as a career though selecting a more liberal phase of that profession. Of captivating charm and beauty, Miss Skinner's character sketches, such as "Snowbound in Iowa," "On the Beach at Barbados" and "An American Girl on the French Telephone," are said to be veritable revelations of her art.

The fifth feature of this gala performance that Mrs. Wilson-Greene will present on November 2 will be Hans Barth, the pianist, in a recital that includes the use of three types of pianos—the harpsichord of long ago, the piano of today, and, thirdly, the new quarter-tone piano of two keyboards which promises to revolutionize piano technique.

This gala performance will be the first of a series of six evening concerts which will offer, in addition, Ethel Leginska and the Boston Women's Orchestra on December 11; Sigrid Onegin, the contralto, on January 11; Jascha Heifetz, the violinist, on January 25; Rosa Raisa, soprano, and Giacomo Rimini, both of the Chicago Opera Co., on February 8, and Mme. Louise Homer on March 8.

GERMANY, ENGLAND DENY EDISON CLAIM

Goebel and Wilson Asserted to Have Invented the Incandescent Light.

AMERICAN IS SUSTAINED

Simultaneously with the celebration all over the United States of Thomas Edison's fiftieth anniversary as inventor of the incandescent light comes the report that the Electric-Technic Society of Hanover, Germany, unveiled last week a tablet to Heinrich Goebel as having invented the incandescent light some 25 years before the Edison patent was filed.

Not long ago the British also celebrated the invention of electric light, linking the name of the eminent physicist and electrician, Sir Joseph Wilson Swan, with the first invention of an electric lamp with a carbon filament. Commenting on Swan, the Encyclopaedia Brittanica, which calls him the inventor of the incandescent lamp, says:

"So far back as 1860 he constructed an electric lamp with a carbon filament, which was formed by packing pieces of paper or card with charcoal powder in a crucible and subjecting the whole to a high temperature. The carbonized paper thus obtained he mounted in the form of a fine strip in a vacuous glass vessel and connected it with a battery of Grove's cells, which not strong enough to raise it to complete incandescence, were sufficient to make it red hot.

"This was substantially the method adopted by Edison nearly 20 years later, after various fruitless efforts to make a practical lamp with a filament of platinum or a platinum alloy had convinced him of the unsuitability of that metal for the purpose —a conclusion which Swan reasoned out for himself many years before.

Won One Decision.

"By the time Edison had hit upon the idea of carbonizing paper or bamboo by heat to form the filament, Swan had devised the further improvement of using cotton thread 'parchmentized' by the action of sulphuric acid, and it was by the aid of such carbon filaments that on the 20th of October, 1880, he gave at Newcastle the first public exhibition of a large scale of electric lighting by means of glow lamps."

Edison's patent rights to the incandescent lamp were sustained in a series of court actions some 30 years ago in the United States. Heinrich Godel was cited by the defendant companies, which the Edison Electric Light Co. sued for infringement of the patents, as having anticipated the invention.

One favorable decision was given to Goebel by the trial judge of the Federal Court in Missouri, a fact which has probably inspired the Germans in their insistence that he was the original inventor of the incandescent lamp.

The Goebel litigation was a cause celebre 30 years ago. Judgments given out by Federal courts in several States review the history of the development of the incandescent lamp. Most of the evidence given was extremely technical, electrical experts testifying on both sides. The judgment of District Judge Colt in the Massachusetts Circuit Court in February, 1893, asserted that Thomas Edison, if he did not conceive the original idea of incandescence, at least was the inventor of "the practical commercial lamp."

Never Asked Patent.

Heinrich Goebel's inventions were alleged to have been made in New York City, to which he came as an emigrant in 1848. Edison was granted his patent in January, 1860, the rights being owned by the Edison Electric Light Co. Competing companies were manufacturing lamps similar to the Edison company, which took proceedings against them for patent infringement.

These companies did not deny the infringement, but contended that Heinrich Goebel's previous invention, as early as 1854, voided the Edison patent for "want of novelty," or at least limited it to the coiled form of filament. Goebel never applied for a patent for his lamp.

Reciting the history of the art out of which incandescent light emerged, Judge Colt said:

"To subdivide the elecrtic light and embody it in a cheap and durable domestic light and embody it in a cheap and durable domestic lamp, capable of successfully competing with gas, had for years baffled the science and skill of the most eminent electricians of this country and in Europe. The difficulty lay in the practical construction of a durable incandescent lamp rather than in a knowledge of the elements which should compose such a structure.

Carbon burners, platinum wires, exhausted glass receivers, were old and well known. As early as 1845 Starr suggested in the King patent a lamp composed of a thin pencil of carbon, inclosed in a Torricellian vacuum; and Roberts in 1852, proposed to cement the nick of the glass globe into a metallic cup, and to provide it with a tube for exhaustion by means of a hand pump.

Edison Persisted.

Later, Lodyguine and others provided their lamps with several short carbon pencils, which were successfully brought into circuit as the pencils were consumed, also various devices for perfecting the joints between the metal base and the glass globe, while Sawyer and Man, in 1878, made the bottom plate of glass instead of metal, and charged the lamp with an atmosphere of nitrogen gas, to avoid destruction of the burner from oxidation. In his 1879 lamp, Edison used a platinum burner, which proved a failure, because the platinum melted near the point of incandescence.

Views of leading electrical experts in Europe were then quoted by the court as being dubious that the problem of division of the electric light would ever be accomplished. Edison, however, persisted in his experiments evolving the platinum model in 1879, which was a failure but from which he developed the final model patented in 1880.

According to the court, Heinrich Goebel's story runs thus: "He came to this country from Germany in 1849. He was a watchmaker and optician by trade, and opened a shop on Monroe street in New York. While in Germany he received instruction in physics from Prof. Munchhausen, of Hanover, and assisted him in making experiments, such as obtaining light from electricity and making galvanic batteries.

"Through this means he learned to make the arc lamp, and he believed that an incandescent lamp could be produced by a small continuous carbon inclosed in an exhausted glass tube hermetically sealed. He also became familiar with the use of the common air pump, the blowpipe, the method of producing the Torricellian vacuum and the making of carbon conductors."

Then follows a description of Goebel's alleged experiments in New York with arc lamps, which led him to the incandescent type. His affidavit said that he constructed three types of such lamps between the years 1850 and 1872. He used one to illuminate a clock in his home and another on a wagon carrying a telescope, which he exhibited. The first type consisted of an exhausted glass tube, with leading in wires sealed into the inclosing chamber by fusion of the glass.

This model together with two subsequent ones were shown at the Monroe street home. A fourth and much improved type of lamp exhibited in the court action was not disclosed to the neighbors and friends, whose testimonies supported Goebel's contentions.

"In the further support of the Goebel anticipation," said the court, "several experts give affidavits to the effect that the Goebel lamp, assuming that it was made prior to 1879, contains the broad invention covered by the second claim of the Edison patents, as it embodied the same combination of a carbon filament with an all-glass exhausted receiver and conductor passing through the glass."

Credit Edison.

These experts further contend that the Goebel lamps had been operative and practical as lights. To refute these statements, the Edison company submitted that the "history of the invention and the prior state of the art" did not justify the Goebel claims. Experts contended that the lamps, called exhibits 1, 2 and 3, "could not have been useful for ordinary lighting purposes and were never a practically operative light."

In rendering his decision, Judge Colt said:

"Whether Goebel made the fiddle-boy lamps 1, 2 and 3 is not necessary to determine. The weight of evidence on this motion is in the direction that he made this lamp or lamps similar in general appearance, though it is manifest that few, if any, of the many witnesses who saw the Goebel lamp could form an accurate judgment of the size of the filament or burner; but assuming they were made, they do not anticipate the invention of Edison.

"At most they were experimental toys used to advertise his telescope, or to flash a light upon his clock. * * * They were crudely constructed, their life was brief. They could not be used for domestic purposes. They were in no proper sense the practical commercial lamp of Edison. The literature of the art is full of better lamps, all of which are held not to anticipate the Edison patent."

U. S. EXPERIMENTS AID TEXTILE SALES

NEW USES ARE SOUGHT

The great textile industry of New England and millions of women in every State in the Union will be benefited by work which is progressing satisfactorily in the textile section of the United States Bureau of Standards, according to a very encouraging report which Representative Edith N. Rogers, of Lowell, Mass., has just received on new uses of cotton.

For several years Mrs. Rogers has been in close touch with the Bureau of Standards, and asked the specialists there to make experiments and tests that will help the New England textile manufacturers in producing salable cotton, and so help the consumers in getting the kind of fabrics that best fit their requirements. Hundreds of women not only in her home district but all over the country have solicited Representative Rogers' efforts to get for them a nonwrinkable cotton. "I think we have a number of cotton materials now that do not wrinkle much," said Mrs. Rogers and she quoted from the report of the Bureau of Standards.

Factors Ruling Quality.

It is known that the strength and elasticity of a cotton yarn spun from a given kind of cotton depend upon the amount of twist; that the properties of the gray fabric depend upon the kind of yarn used, the thread count, and the nature of the weave; that the effect of the finishing processes must also be included in determining the properties of the finished fabric.

There are bits of information available here and there, giving the numerical relations between these factors, but no comprehensive study of the subject has been made. This study the specialists in the Bureau of Standards are now engaged upon.

With this information a manufacturer would know what effect to expect from any change in his manufacturing process, and conversely, he would know how to change his process to produce a desired effect. The development of a new fabric would, therefore, not entail the laborious and expensive experimentations now found necessary.

Service, Not Article, Sold.

According to modern business ideas, the purchaser buys a service rather than an article. The properties of fabrics as thus studied by the Bureau of Standards in making its investigations should therefore be a measure of the amount and kind of service which the fabric will give.

The usual specifications for a textile fabric include requirements as to the kind of fiber, thread count, weight and strength. The purchaser tells the manufacturer how the fabric shall be made, and relies upon his own experience to interpret the results in terms of service. If the purchaser could write a specification covering the service demanded, then no interpretation would be necessary. The manufacturer, being left free to make the fabric of any material and in any way he can, would probably find ways to cut the cost of production without impairing the quality of the goods.

It seems, therefore, that fabrics should be tested for service ability rather than construction. To this end the textile division of the Bureau of Standards is now collecting, designing or building instruments to measure thermal conductivity, launderability, slipperiness, resilience, draping qualities, luster, handle, stiffness, resistance to abrasion and all the other elusive items which go to make up the consumer's opinion of quality.

Progress on Subject Slow.

Progress on the development of an unwrinkable cotton fabric has been unduly slow because there is no method of testing for this property, the textile section explains.

It is believed by the Federal specialists that most of the services now rendered by fabrics can be rendered by cotton fabrics. To design cotton fabrics for these services will require not only complete knowledge of the effects of the design on the properties of the fabric, but also the means for measuring and giving numerical expression to the items which contribute to the service.

The textile section is working on both these lines at present with the hope of establishing a foundation for the rational and continued growth of the cotton textile industry. The Cotton Textile Institute, through its research associate in this work, is rendering valuable cooperative assistance.

SEPTEMBER 22
"Virgo."

IF September 22 is your birthday, the best hours for you on this date are from 9:30 a. m. to 11 a. m., and from 4:30 p. m. to 6 p. m. The danger periods are from noon to 2 p. m. and from 9 p. m. to 10:30 p. m.

The influences for this day are not clearly indicated for the major part of the time. A decided atmosphere of mental depression will prevail after sunset, and if you allow yourself to be influenced, the evening will not be a pleasant one. Be master of your thoughts!

The child born on this September 22 will be very observing, quick to learn, and will usually be able to do what it has seen others do. It will not possess much originality, but will be painstaking and prudent.

You have a very impetuous nature and easily lose your temper. A few fireworks are essential to most temperaments. They insure the smooth running of both the mind and physical machine. A constant explosion, however, is not necessary or advisable. Why always be on the defensive, as though every one were your enemy? Life would be a much jollier affair for you if you stopped searching for evil and recognized the signs of good. Baseless little antagonisms have been the cause of your missing many fine friendships.

You are an excellent student in most things and have good understanding. You love to dig things out for yourself and can supply your knowledge with skill. It is better for you to rely upon logical reasoning than upon your powers of intuition. You are a very poor character analyzer—you allow prejudice to step in. It is difficult for you to view things from an impersonal standpoint.

You resent any form of supervision or discipline and are very unhappy when you have to take orders from another. You desire power and authority, although you are too dictatorial to become a popular leader. You would rather have your subordinates fear than love you.

HORSE RACING WILL FEATURE BIG FAIR

Four-Day Exhibition at Fredericksburg Will Open on Tuesday.

BEST RUNNERS BOOKED

Special to The Washington Post.

Fredericksburg, Va., Sept. 21.—Horse racing is to be one of the chief features of the Fredericksburg Greater Fair which opens Tuesday for a four-day exhibition. Track events have always been prominent at local fairs and this year are more in the spotlight than ever since there is to be no racing at the State fair in Richmond.

Some of the best runners on the Eastern circuit are booked to compete here, including such stables as those of C. F. Miles, Skinker Brothers, Louis Leith, J. Harris and the Benton Brothers. A number of the mounts are already quartered in the fair grounds stables being put in condition for next week's events and others are coming in daily.

W. T. Peyton is racing secretary for the fair and will have the assistance of A. S. Eastman, starter. Of outstanding interest at the present time are the popularity contest and baby contest which are at fever heat. Handsome loving cups and cash prizes are to be awarded to the winners who will be announced on Friday, the closing day of the fair at a mammoth pageant to be presided over by Fredericksburg's favorite daughter.

More than two score youngsters are entered in the baby competition and their fond mothers are straining every resource to aid their young hopefuls. Leaders in the popularity contest at present are Miss Nellie Herndon, Miss Mary Calamos, Mrs. Violette Stoner and Miss Virginia Stevens.

Competition is intense and the standings change from day to day. Many entries are being made in the agricultural and live stock departments while the ladies' classes bid fair to excel those on any previous year. Manager H. K. Sweetser has secured an exceptionally good program of entertainment including high-class vaudeville acts to be shown between the races, an excellent group of midway attractions and a mammoth fireworks display at night.

Sons of Veterans To Convene Soon

Virginia Delegates Will Meet October 8 in Petersburg.

Petersburg, Va., Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Delegates from all sections of Virginia will come to Petersburg October 8 for the annual three-day convention of the Sons of Confederate Veterans. Entertainment plans have been completed by the local committee, and an attendance of several hundred is expected.

Charles T. Norman, of Richmond, is commander of the Virginia Division and will preside at the convention here. Names of delegates, sponsors and chaperons are being assembled by Adjutant Douglas Wherry, of Richmond, and camps that have not forwarded the names of their representatives are requested to do so immediately by Commander Norman.

Among the entertainment features to be afforded the visitors to the Cockade City are two balls and a trip over the battle fields, including the famous crater and the tunnels dug at the siege of Petersburg.

The convention here will be the thirty-fourth annual session of the organization.

MOTHER TO DEMAND JURY IN POISON CASE

Mrs. Hattie Stone, Accused of Killing Son, "Jolly," Jailer Declares.

DEFENSE READY, REPORT

Belair, Md., Sept. 21.—Trial by jury will be asked by Mrs. Hattie Stone when she goes into the Harford County Court Monday morning on a charge of murdering her 15-year-old son, George, by poison.

This announcement today by Harold E. Cobourn, of Perryville, her attorney, terminated conjecture on the woman's attitude on this point since her indictment by the grand jury on Friday of last week, and served to allay speculation that a change of venue might be sought.

Cobourn, in making public that the defense was ready, added: "We would try the case in Havre de Grace, which seems to be the hot bed of all the hysteria over the matter, if it were possible."

In addition to the usual panel of 25, the State has summoned 40 extra talesmen in an effort to surmount any obstacle that might arise in selection of a jury, general belief prevailing that many prospective jurors will be exhausted by challenge. Between 50 and 60 witnesses also have been summoned.

Large Crowd Expected.

Because of the widespread interest in the trial, a big crowd is anticipated and Deputy Sheriff Walter Bennington said today "we expect a little cooperation from the State police in case the crowd gets difficult to handle."

A few extra chairs and tables have been placed in the small trial room. Most of them are for the convenience of newspaper men. Special telegraph facilities also have been installed in the town for the convenience of the press.

Bobourn has conferred with his client only two or thre times since her indictment, it was said at the jail today.

"Ready," Woman Declares.

"I'm ready," Mrs. Stone told the jailers when they talked to her of the forthcoming trial.

"She seems to be pretty jolly and didn't appear at all worried," a jail attendant commented.

Mrs. Stone's entire family died mysteriously in four years. First, her mother-in-law, Mrs. Emma Stone, died; then her eldest son, Edgar.

In January, 1928, her husband, Edward Stone, a railroader, died on a Pennsylvania train at Edgewood. The last death was that of her son, George, 15 years old, who died June 4 this year.

Evidence of Poison.

The State will contend that Mrs. Sone killed George by giving him strychnine. Chemists who examined the boy's vitals reported that it was strychnine that caused his death. The same chemists examined the organs of Mrs. Stone's husband after his body had been exhumed and reported that he, too, died of strychnine poisoning.

What evidence the State had gathered in the case of the husband was given to the grand jury with that pertaining to George Stone's death, but in the case of the husband the jurors failed to act.

Mrs. Stone was arrested June 13. It was charged, at an unsuccessful effort to have her released on a habeas corpus writ, that she admitted to her sister-in-law, Mrs. May Baker, having poisoned her son to get money enough to elope with Jimmy Aberts, a young railroad brakeman who formerly boarded in her home at Havre de Grace. Aberts and Mrs. Baker are among the many witnesses who have been summoned.

He started at 14 in the coal mines and his last activity was as foreman of the mine of the West Virginia Pulp and Paper Co. Besides his wife he is survived by eight children, all of Westernport, Md. Two Ill of Smallpox Escape Pesthouse

Indianapolis, Sept. 21.—wearing leg irons and chains, two prisoners held in the Marion County pesthouse, suffering from virulent cases of smallpox, have escaped. The man, Harrison Powell, giving his address as "city," and Otis Edans, No. 1302 Deloss street, were being held in jail on charges of robbery and blind tiger, respectively, when it was found they were suffering from the disease.

They were taken immediately to the pesthouse, near the city hospital, and placed in chains. This precaution was taken, it was pointed out, because of the difficulty in keeping policemen on duty at the house. It would be almost impossible for the men to remove the leg irons without injuring themselves seriously, the sheriff said.

INQUEST IN STRIKE KILLING POSTPONED

New Evidence Will Be Given on Wednesday, Says an Official.

UNIONS PLAN MEETING

Charlotte, N. C., Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Judicial disposition of the textile labor disorder cases was further delayed today with postponement of the resumption of the inquest into the mob killing of Mrs. Ella May Wiggins, strike leader, slain en route to a union speaking September 14.

Solicitor John G. Carpenter at first said that he would not be prepared to proceed with the investigation for a week, but later decided to reopen the inquest Wednesday. The solicitor was hopeful of presenting "considerable" new evidence to Coroner J. F. Wallace and his jury.

According to Liston M. Oak, publicity director for the international labor defense, the Nation-wide meetings planned for today and tomorrom as "mass protests" against the shooting of Mrs. Wiggins were being confined to the larger cities of the country.

"There will be no open protest meetings in this section at the present time," Oak said. "Just now the members of the National Textile Workers Union here are gathering only at private conferences. Plans are being laid, however, for open meetinngs next week."

He said open demonstrations were being arranged in New York for tonight and in Chicago tomorrow. Solicitor Carpenter and former Congressman Bulwinkle and Clyde R. Hoey, all of counsel for the prosecution of sixteen strikers and strike leaders for the murder of Gastonia Police Chief O. F. Aderholt, expressed little concern over a purported plot by "New York City radicals" for their assassination. The plot was described in a letter to Edwin R. Bridges, former pardon commissioner, from a man who was paroled from prison during his administration.

Capital Transient Problem Studied

Welfare Council Directs Committee to Make Investigation.

In an effort to evolve better methods for taking care of stranded transients, the Council of Social Agencies has ordered its committee on transients to make a study of the transient situation in Washington, the council announced yesterday.

The survey will be made by two trained workers and will extend over a period of three months. It will be conducted under supervision of the Travelers Aid Society, with Mrs. Margaret Ford, executive secretary, in charge.

For the purpose of the survey the committee has adopted a definition, used in other cities, which declares that a transient is "a person stranded in the city, without ocal residence or plans, or one whose plans can not be carried out without the advice or assistance of a welfare agency."

ACTS ARE ENGAGED FOR SHRINE CIRCUS

Committees Work on Plans to Make Masonic Event Big Success.

CHILDREN TO BE GUESTS

Arrangements for the Shrine circus are being completed, it was announced last night by Edwin C. Dutton, honorary chairman of the committee of Almas Temple, which is preparing the circus. Dutton announced that more than a score of acts have been contracted to appear in the circus, which will be staged at the Washington Auditorium October 1 to 3.

Other officers and committees to handle various details of the event are: F. Lawrence Walker, honorary vice chairman; James C. Hoyle, director of publicity; George E. Harris, general chairman; Frank Jones, treasurer; George E. King and W. Maurice Williams, advertising; Wilfred E. Lawson, ticket sales; Capt. Harry Weirich, ushers; Capt. William Holmes, orphans; George E. King, newsboys; Dr. Thomas Miller, radio announcer; Henry Schmidt, ticket-takers; Louis S. Yasell, director Almas Temple Band; Charles J. Benter, manager Almas Temple Band, and Dr. Charles S. White, first aid.

Special arrangements have been made by the members of the order to care for the many children who otherwise would be deprived of the opportunity to witness the display.

Proceeds will be turned into a fund which will be devoted to defraying the expenses of delegates appointed to represent local Masons at the international convention to be held in Toronto, Ontario, October 1-3.

Detroit Population 1,601,073 in 1928

Detroit, Sept. 21.—Detroit's population now is 1,601,073, a gain of 122,338 over 1928, the 1929 school census indicates. Frank Cody, superintendent of the Board of Education, announces.

The total school census as of June 1, was 402,670, compared with 371,902 a year ago, A. H. Hennigar, director of attendance, reported.

The West Side showed the greatest percentage of increase, or 9.4 per cent. The East Side's increase was 7.6 per cent. Every ward in the city showed an increase.

The total number of families in the city is 377,975.

Woman in Hospital Campaigns From Bed

Rutland, Vt., Sept. 21.—Mrs. Dorothy Leonard Aldrich, woman attorney and candidate for city grand juror, will direct her political campaign from her bed in the Rutland City Hospital, having undergone an operation for appendicitis. She is making a good recovery.

Mrs. Aldrich has been conducting an active campaign among the women voters of the city. She is one of five candidates who are seeking the office of city grand juror.

Treasure Found In Buried Capital

Roman City in France Mine of Valuable Antiquities.

Saint-Gaudens, France, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—A mine of antiquity, seemingly inexhaustible, has been discovered by the archeologists, MM. Lisop and Sapene, at St. Bertrand de Comminges. It is now but a township of 515 souls, but in B. C. 72 it was Lugdunum Concenarum, a Roman city of 80,000 inhabitants, capital of an important region.

Every day its soil yields treasures to the picks of the savants. An imperial trophy, busts of emperors, statues of gods, tombs of early Christians, and a quantity of smaller objects, more homely and human, such as thimbles, needles and fibulae, are among the treasures, artistic and domestic, that have been dug up.

Most curious of all the finds are little bells which, the archeologists say, were hung around the necks of children to ward off evil spirits and drown by their silvery tinkle sounds of ill omen.

Date Set for Garden Report.

Farmville, Va., Sept. 21 (A.P.).—L. B. Dietrick, of the Virginia Polytechnic Institute, will make his report to members of the home demonstration clubs in Prince Edward County at their meeting at Farmville Lake, Wednesday, October 2. The report will give the final score in the county garden club contest, in which 44 gardens originally were entered. Only 14 carried out the provisions of the contest and continued to the final scoring.

the Vita-Minute hand . . . of the advertiser's watch

ADVERTISERS have been watching newspaper readers. They know your reading habits.

They have observed, for instance, that during your morning hours, when you're fresh and rested, your mind works with a speed and clarity which it rarely attains again till the next morning. Naturally you read with more interest when you're rested than when you're tired.

They have observed that you read the Post during those morning hours whose minutes are different enough to be called Vita-Minutes.

They've also noticed that advertisements are read more carefully and acted upon more frequently at this time than at any other time of the day.

Advertisers, therefore, have a special sort of feeling about getting their messages into the Post because it is read during the hours that are made of Vita-Minutes. That, of course, is when such messages do most for both advertiser and reader.

Further, they have a special sort of feeling about the Post. They know that it goes into the homes that do most of the buying in Washington, and covers this territory which makes "the Washington market." That it is a trusted, depended-upon newspaper, with sales-producing coverage.

They've noticed all those things. That is why their watches have Vita-Minute hands.

MISSOURI COLLEGE INSISTS ON POVERTY

BEGIN AS ILLITERATES

Special to The Washington Post.

Hollister, Mo., Sept. 14.—Poverty, a will to work and not less than nine years in the Ozark backhills of southwestern Missouri are the entrance requirements which prospective students must fulfill if they are to enjoy the benefits of the School of the Ozarks, near here, an institution dedicated to the bringing of enlightenment to sons and daughters of illiterate mountaineers.

The School of the Ozarks, when compared to the ordinary American college or high school, is unique in both its aims and management. The institution is nondenominational, lightly endowed and largely self-supporting. Its students and faculty during the school year hardly realize that money is existent.

The tender in which its tuition is paid, its dormitories maintained and its tables supplied is work—work by hardy mountain boys and girls, who support themselves and their alma mater by their labors.

"Young man, if you have money you can't come to this school," is a statement that President Robert M. Good makes many times a year, and then he tells of the things the school affords to the young man or woman willing to work.

Entrants Illiterate.

Besides modern dormitories and administration buildings the school maintains an upland farm of 360 acres, a modern cannery, a dairy and creamery, a laundry, a printing plant, extensive recreation grounds, an auditorium and community buildings. It has 191 students, a faculty of nineteen and is a member of the North Central Association of American High Schools and Colleges. In its curriculum are courses in vocational agriculture, printing and typography, farm administration, domestic science and pedagogy, in addition to elementary and high school courses.

A large portion of the students of the school come from mountain families with from eight to fourteen children. Almost half of them are totally illiterate at the time of their entrance and their ages range from 9 to 28 years. On repeated occasions prospective members of the student body have tramped from 50 to 100 miles through the country unpenetrated by railroads and scarcely touched by main highways to gather at the school of the Ozarks to earn while they learn.

Paid for Work.

These hill youngsters, President Good says, have proved to have exceptional capacities for adapting themselves to the new environment. Girls and boys accustomed to living in one-room hillside cabins, washing in cedar basins filled with ice-cold spring water, warming themselves in double circles before a smoky fireplace, with hardly more than a week to become familiar with the intricacies of running water, steam heat, supervised dining and classroom routine, they fit easily into "store-bought" clothes and in general their appearance is easily as favorable as that of the student body of the average city high school.

The students take care of a dairy herd of 26 registered cows, keep a flock of about 1,000 Leghorn hens, operate a home canning plant to preserve fruits and vegetables from the farm not consumed by the students, and operate a small printing plant.

Every student labors eighteen hours a week for the school in a job best suited to his or her vocational aptitude. As the youngsters need new clothes, they put in extra hours on the farm or in the cannery. A few hours buys a suit of overalls, and an hour or two buys a hat or a tie. Before students are accepted they are required to do six weeks of work in the summer on the farm. Every student is given compensation for hours worked over the required eighteen a week, but supervisors are careful not to permit overwork.

Have Canning Factory.

Every facility for recreation possible in this remote section is provided for the entertainment of students. There are tenns courts, baseball diamonds, a place to swim in the river, cinder track and a gymnasium to provide recreation for a countryside which apparently has had little realization of the value of play.

The canning factory has a capacity of 30,000 cases of canned goods a season. A sufficient supply to afford the best of fare to the students is placed in storage for the winter, and the surplus goods, including tomatoes, corn, beans, peas and apples, are sold. In addition, large quantities of fresh vegetables and fruits are sold to tourists and nearby towns during the summer.

Of the $50,000 spent annually for maintenance of the institution, from $10,000 to $15,000 as voted for permanent improvements on grounds and industries. About $40,000 is received annually from endowments and donations, and the remainder is realized from profits on the farm.

Two years the school, with a surplus of $700, began construction on a $100,000 administration building. Students and faculty members joined in the labor, dug the foundation, rigged out a discarded sawmill for sawing large timbers and began quarrying stone for the walls. Citizens of Taney County, Mo., gave $1,500, and students continued high-heartedly with their building.

Gave $100,000 Fund.

Then A. P. Greene, well-known Missouri philanthropist, contributed the remainder as a portion of his permanent endowment contribution of $100,000. The new building is a handsome natural stone structure of three stories and contains a gymnasium, chapel, commercial classrooms, manual training laboratory and administrative offices.

The School of the Ozarks was founded some twenty years ago by the Rev. James E. Forsyth, who floated down White River on a raft, made a landing and casually opened a school. His free-lance school then was taken over by the Presbyterian Synod of Missouri in 1915, which bought for it the building which housed the exhibits of the Maine Hunting and Fishing Club at the St. Louis World's Fair. The school was then moved to its present site and the building reconstructed on the farm. From this small beginning the school progressed rapidly.

The school, however, while administered by the Presbyterian Church, is strictly nondenominational.

FROM A SENATOR'S DIARY

Being the Day-by-Day Observations of a "Member-at-Large" Set Down for His Own Satisfaction.

By the 97th Senator.

September 11.

I HAVE had occasion often to comment on the mellowing influence of the Senate. Many a fire-eater has succumbed to its spell. There is something soothing about its clubby atmosphere.

The late Pitchfork Ben Tillman, for instance, promised his constituents in South Carolina he'd raise hell and high water if they'd elect him to the Senate. They elected him and Ben came to Washington, but in less time than it takes to tell it he grew chummy with the hated Yankees from New England. Before he died he became so mild that he persuaded the Senate to adopt an antismoking rule in the chamber.

The late Jeff Davis, of Arkansas—not the President of the Confederacy—promised to walk down the center aisle of the Senate in his bare feet and wave his shoes under the Vice President's nose. But he never made good and he soon passed into political oblivion.

I could mention other cases like this, but in recent years there is nothing comparable to the metamorphosis of Henry Allen, of Kansas. It seems only yesterday that he was a ripsnortin' Bull Mooser, cavorting over the prairies and lambasting the "reactionaries" of the Republican party with a fervor that gladdened the hearts of the progressive farmer folks of the wheat belt.

Last spring he came to the Senate to succeed Charley Curtis, who, it will be recalled, had been elevated to the Vice Presidency. The rapidity and thoroughness with which he divested himself of all his progressive habiliments should command the admiration of every one. In the twinkling of an eye Henry had changed his political make-up and garbed himself in the costume of Republican regularity. I am told that the agile Arthur Capper himself turned green with envy.

Henry firmly established himself on the side of regularity by his votes within the last week. When they called the roll on the Simmons resolution for the income returns of corporations affected by the tariff Henry's name led all the rest in opposition, although the entire progressive bloc and several stalwart regulars supported the measure. On the following day the Senate voted on Jim Watson's motion to defer action on the Vare case until December. Henry again broke away from his progressive brethren and lined up with Jim.

After these two demonstrations William Allen White must feel terribly lonesome. Dave Mulvane told me that Henry was "adaptable." Now I believe him.

September 12.

THOSE who thought that Reed Smoot and Furnifold Simmons were going to conduct their tariff debate in secret were all wrong. Both have recovered their voices and from now on the debate will be audible in all parts of the Senate chamber without the aid of ear trumpets.

SENATOR SHORTRIDGE.

The erroneous assumption that they were going to debate the tariff with the soft pedal clamped down hard, a la Murray Crane, was natural enough. It came about in this way:

Smoot was seated at his desk just across the aisle not more than ten feet away from Simmons when the tariff bill came up. They began one of their interchanges. The subject has become so familiar to them that they feel it unnecessary to punctuate their remarks with the customary overtones of senatorial oratory. The result was that no one could hear them.

It was only by their gestures that the Senate became aware of the fact that they were engaged in a debate. Every now and then Smoot would tap his desk lightly with a knuckle and Simmons would retaliate with a sweeping circular motion with a large magnifying glass. After this pantomime had been in progress some minutes, the official stenographers began to suspect that the two tariff gladiators were staging one of their confidential jousts. They moved up closer with their notebooks and were able to catch an occasional scattered word of the debate.

Borah later confirmed the fact that a debate was in progress between the two senators. He pushed a chair up beside Smoot, cupped his hand behind his ear and detected a whisper which sounded like "adequate protection" and "reasonable duties" coming from Smoot and a faintly audible rejoinder containing the words "indefensible" and "monstrous" from the Simmons side of the aisle. Walter Edge grew tired of straining his ears and broke up the encounter with a quorum call.

But today things were changed. Both Smoot and Simmons were in old-time form. Some one must have told them that the Senate would like to hear what they had to say about the tariff. Each delivered a carefully prepared speech, and Tom Heflin himself, with all his lung power, couldn't have improved upon their tonal quality and volume.

September 13.

THE tragic death of Representative Kvale, of Minnesota, removed the last of the Farmer-Laborites from the House and once again the lower branch of Congress, for the first time in many years, is a simon-pure two-party affair. One by one the third-party members have been picked off by death or defeat. Republicans and Democrats now hold all the seats.

The situation is almost unparalleled in the recent history of Congress. Nearly every House has had its sprinkling of Socialists, Independents, Progressives or Farmer-Laborites. The last of the Socialists disappeared when Victor Berger went down to defeat last fall and then died as a result of injuries sustained in an automobile accident.

The House comes much nearer to having strict party rule than the Senate. In addition to the elimination of the third-party members, it is a fact that the insurgent bloc in the House has been reduced to impotency. Even the Wisconsin members of the House have little fight left in them. The trio of Longworth, Snell and Tilson rule the House pretty much as they please.

SENATOR ALLEN.

Henrik Shipstead now has the distinction of being the only Farmer-Laborite in either house. Some prophesied his political extinction last November, but the Minnesotans forgot their party affiliations and re-elected him by a larger majority than ever.

I hear reports that Andy Volstead, coauthor with the late Wayne B. Wheeler of the national prohibition law, will try to stage a comeback. Volstead formerly represented Kvale's district in the House. Kvale defeated him overwhelmingly in 1920, but the courts reversed the voters on the ground that Kvale had circulated a report that Volstead was an atheist. Two years later Kvale ousted Volstead again, and on that occasion the courts could find no flaw in the election.

Perhaps Volstead's return to Congress would be helpful to the administration in finding a way to enforce his legislative masterpiece. At any rate he could assist in restoring the tobacco-chewing habit, which in these effete times is becoming all too rare among statesmen.

September 14.

FAR be it from me to defend propagandists and lobbyists. I agree that in the main they are a bad lot, but their power for evil, in my humble judgment, is greatly overestimated. I see no necessity for becoming panic-stricken over their presence in Washington, even though they may be more numerous than ever before. They have been here a long time and they will continue to be here, no doubt, until the millennium arrives in politics. Even then it may be difficult to get rid of the pesky critturs.

I know several lobbyists personally. I'm not the least bit scared of them. I'm not afraid to talk to them if they come to call on me. I'm quite sure that they never have any influence on my vote. I doubt whether they ever control a vote in the Senate. They are active and engaging fellows but I don't believe they fool any one except the gullible folks who employ them.

I read that the shipbuilding corporations hired one William B. Shearer to act as "observer" and keep them informed of the progress of the disarmament conference at Geneva. This Shearer may be a very clever person but the shipbuilders undoubtedly could have kept themselves better informed by reading the newspaper dispatches from Geneva. Certainly they would have saved themselves money.

Now we are engaged in a senatorial investigation of Shearer's activities. I voted for an investigation. Doubtless it will turn up some interesting facts. Assuredly it will not lack dignity. The appointment of "Solemn Sam" Shortridge as chairman of the investigating committee guarantees that.

Autos Menace Night Sweepers in London

London, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Cleaning the streets of London at night is such a dangerous job that the city fathers ordered the sweepers to wear white panels down the backs of their dark blue smocks.

Motorists complained that the blue uniforms and black hats blended so perfectly with the murk and mist of the London night that the men could not be seen, and the cleaners declared that they could not do their best work with the fear of being run over constantly haunting them.

THE ATTITUDE OF FRANCE.

France has evolved a plan for successfully resisting an attempt by British and American negotiators to fix the type and tonnage of French naval vessels. Such an attempt is apprehended, largely because of the indiscreet moves of the new British government in opposing French objectives at The Hague and Geneva while courting a "special understanding" with the United States. The unmistakable intimation is conveyed from Paris that French official and public opinion is convinced that Ramsay MacDonald's policy is to sacrifice the entente with France for the sake of forming an entente with the biggest power of all, the United States.

The reliable Associated Press now reports from Paris that its correspondent "learned from authoritative French sources tonight that France will consider any decision of the projected five-power naval conference as merely provisional. France will value them solely as a contribution to a draft treaty to be composed at Geneva for submittal to an international disarmament conference."

Thus France intends to change the character of the conference which the British government is sponsoring. Instead of empowering the conference to draw up a treaty limiting the fleets of the five principal naval powers France would merely empower the conference to draw up a tentative plan to be submitted to the ultimate universal disarmament conference toward which, as toward the end of the world, "the whole creation moves."

On this basis France can accept with pleasure the invitation of the MacDonald government to attend the five-power conference in London next January or February. Italy can afford to accept, with the same understanding; and so can Japan. Secretary Stimson is now holding conversations with Ambassador Claudel, presumably for the purpose of smoothing over the ruffled feelings of France as a consequence of the brusque utterances of Philip Snowden at The Hague and Lord Cecil at Geneva. No doubt Mr. Stimson is confident that superior tact and finesse will bring France around into a melting mood. Who knows? Perhaps the application of State Department ointment may induce France to yield to the British plan for the abolition of submarines. These vessels, employed by France and Italy, threaten to destroy British naval supremacy in the Mediterranean.

It is a pity that Mr. Stimson was not a member of the American delegation to the Washington conference. He would have remembered the mendacious exploit of Lord Lee, of Fareham, who read what purported to be an official French statement supporting the theory that the inhuman use of submarines is justified in war. The statement was a gross libel upon French policy, but it served the purpose of placing France temporarily in a bad light and perhaps induced the American delegates to look with favor upon the British proposal to abolish submarines altogether.

France has not forgotten that incident. Perhaps its refusal to accept President Coolidge's invitation to Geneva in 1927 may be traced to Lord Lee's misrepresentations at Washington. At any rate, France is building submarines, having 89 built and building.

Naturally, France's plan to transform the pending London conference into another "preparatory conference" does not meet the views of Prime Minister MacDonald, who aims at the consummation of a five-power treaty without delay. By inducing the United States and Japan to quit cruiser building and persuading France and Italy to quit submarine building the British fleet would remain superior, and Britain would be saved the expense of further construction. A mere program to be submitted to a universal conference after a program for land disarmament had also been prepared would mean interminable delay, during which the British navy would lose its superiority unless new vessels were constructed.

Japan and Italy join France in insisting upon conscription and the maintenance of trained reserves, and Lord Cecil withdraws British objections to that rule, after having unnecessarily aroused French antagonism. Now, when France suggests that the five-power naval conference shall merely prepare a program for the consideration of a universal disarmament conference she is virtually proposing to shelve Britain's plan to bring about naval limitation at this time.

ENEMIES OF PROSPERITY.

A new and dangerous assault upon American prosperity, especially the prosperity of well-paid workingmen, is revealed in the practice of certain American manufacturing concerns which are building up large establishments abroad, with cheap labor, and then sending cheap-labor goods into the American market. These concerns made their capital in the United States, but they are employing it to destroy American prosperity. They are striving to reduce the tariff on their goods, and if they succeed they will drive thousands of American workers into idleness and want.

Senator Goff discloses the fact that the Senate committee on finance has knowledge of more than 200 manufacturing establishments in Germany, France, Italy, Mexico, Argentina, Japan and other countries which are financed and owned by Americans who made their money in this country under the protective tariff. These concerns are now clamoring for tariff reduction in order that they can flood the United States with cheap-labor goods. The arguments they put forth are eagerly seized by demagogues as reasons why the tariff should be reduced. International bankers interested in foreign loans are joining in the propaganda aimed at breaking down the protection that surrounds American industry and labor.

It is the aim of the protective tariff to shield every industry that is threatened with ruinous competition from abroad in order to protect the men employed in that home industry. The expatriated Americans who go abroad to exploit cheap labor and use it to destroy home industries that employ highly paid labor are enemies of this country and a menace to its welfare. As Senator Goff well says, "they are not national servants, and they are entitled to no privilege or consideration, either as exporters from abroad or as importers at home."

American money invested abroad must not be permitted to become an instrument destructive of America's prosperity. The banking and manufacturing interests that are seeking to tear down the protective tariff are heartless and selfish to the last degree, and would betray their own countrymen. If these expatriates wish to compete in the American market, let them compete fairly. If they pay pauper wages abroad, let them pay a tariff when they send their goods to America.

The workers of the United States enjoy high wages and their labor week is growing shorter. Employers here are cooperating in this emancipation of labor from serfdom. The most potent single agency in safeguarding the high standard reached by American labor is the protective tariff. The workers in all industries are entitled to this protection as American citizens. No honest men in any industry, manufacturing or agricultural, will begrudge protection to other industries. The two great political parties are in honor bound to grant increased duties to any industry that is unprotected against foreign competition. When Democrats or Republicans try to give foreign industries an advantage over Americans in the American market they are striking at the livelihood of American workingmen and their families.

When legislators are in doubt as to the amount of duty that should be assessed to insure protection of industry and labor they should resolve the doubt in favor of Americans and not foreigners. Congress should make sure that expatriated Americans operating with cheap labor abroad shall not take advantage of their countrymen here who are honestly and fairly competing with one another.

MISSOURI MONGOOSE.

The courts of Missouri have other problems aside from those arising out of the eighteenth amendment. The Zoological Society, of St. Louis, owns a pair of mongooses. These animals have been condemned to die because it is asserted that it is against the law to import, possess, harbor or retain animals of the mongoose family. Very eminent lawyers have been retained by the owning society to save the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Mongoose.

The outcome of the efforts of these members of the St. Louis bar to stave off capital punishment will be watched with interest in many sections of the country and more particularly by the residents of the Virgin Islands. Once, in the distant past, Santa Cruz and St. Thomas were overrun with poisonous snakes. Mongooses were imported from India to eat the snakes. The original mongoosian immigrants and their progeny set out to perform the task, and worked so industriously that they shortly "ate themselves out of a job," as one of the Santa Crusians explained. They devoured all the snakes, and then, being still hungry, started in to devour the birds. Before long they had made havoc with all the bird life of the islands except domestic chickens, and when last heard from were well along in the job of depleting the fowl population.

St. Thomas will watch the outcome of that St. Louis trial, and if the mongooses win, a thriving trade in bootlegging mongooses may be started from the Antilles to the shores of the Mississippi.

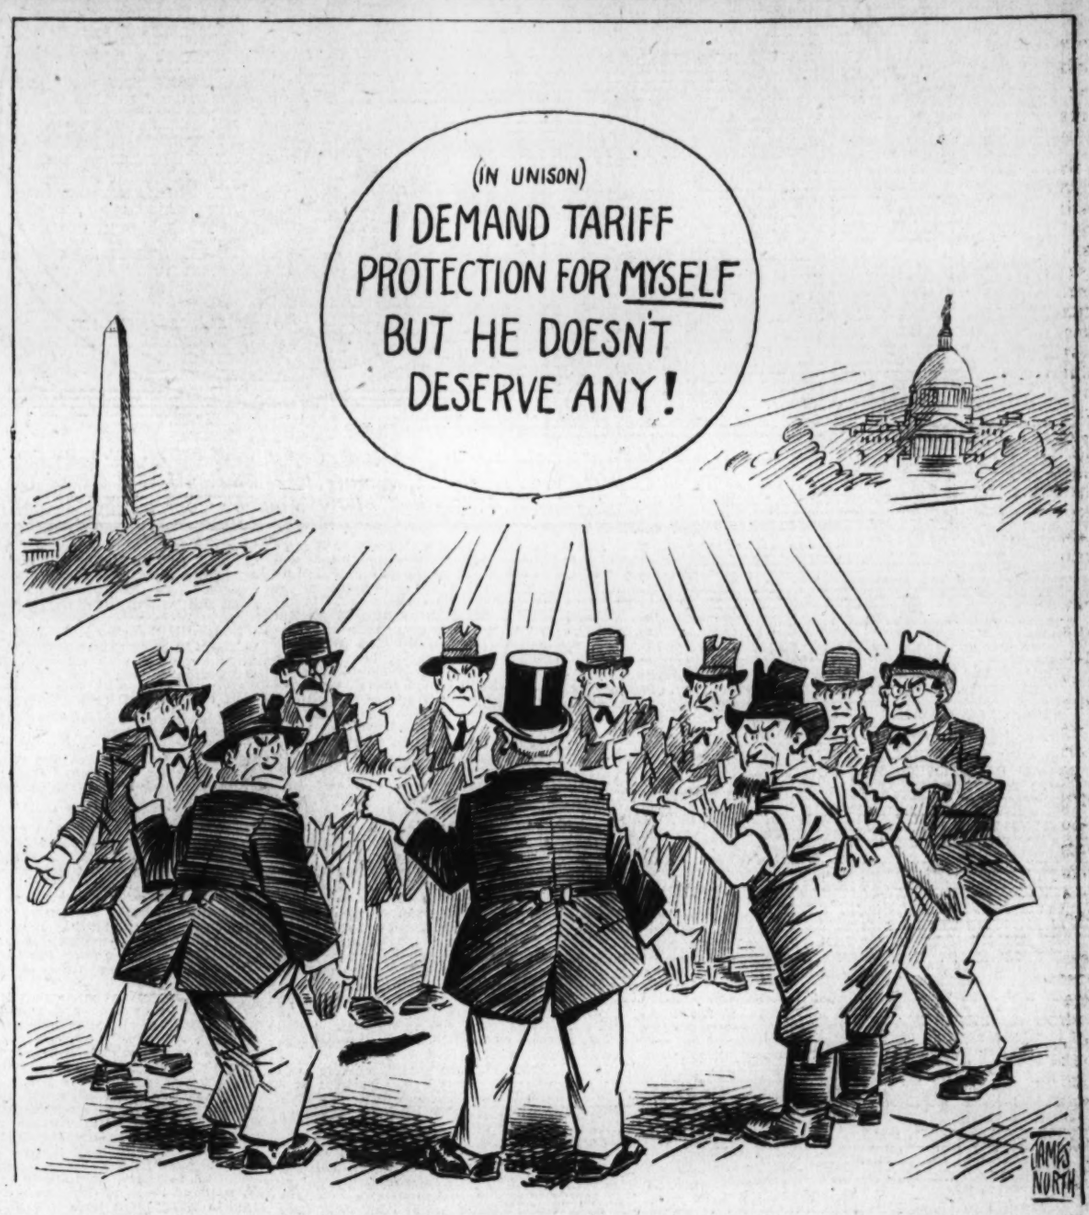
THE FILM CONTROVERSY.

The Franco-American film controversy, which was precipitated last September and which came to a climax last March when American producers withdrew from the French market, has been settled. Under terms of an agreement reached by the French film industry and representatives of Will Hays' office the status quo is established to extend until October 1, 1930, during which period the parties agree to work out a permanent settlement based upon a principle other than the quota system, and if such an agreement is not reached by October 1, 1930, the limit of the truce is extended for another year. Both sides are satisfied with the agreement, the Americans because of the fact that it marks the eventual abandonment of the objectionable quota system, and the French because it means that American films, for the lack of which cinema houses throughout the country were forced to close their doors, will again be available.

The controversy was precipitated when France determined to adopt drastic means to protect and nurture its starving film industry. It was decided by the French authorities to enforce a quota system under which American exhibitors would be compelled to purchase French films in return for the right to exhibit American films. American producers protested, but Mr. Hays consented to a compromise arrangement whereby, for a term of one year, 60 per cent of the total importation of the year 1927 would be admitted without restriction and additional films would be admitted on a seven-to-one quota basis. In March the French authorities announced that the quota would be reduced to four to one, whereupon American producers withdrew from France, on the ground that such an arrangement would preclude profitable operation and that in any circumstances a quota arrangement was unsatisfactory.

American industry has the producers to thank for carrying through to a successful conclusion the fight against the quota principle. Spain, Great Britain, Germany, Austria, Mexico and other nations have been watching developments with the end in view of adopting similar restrictive measures for the protection of their film industries. Had the quota system been accepted by the American film industry it probably would have been applied to other commodities in short order. What would have prevented the French motor car industry from attempting to place the importation of American automobiles on a quota basis in order to force the sale of French automobiles? The situation would have been all the more serious, inasmuch as the price to be charged for the permit-carrying products was not specified.

The way now is cleared for a permanent solution of the controversy satisfactory to both sides. American producers are not opposed to paying customs duties on films sent to France and there is no reason why France should not apply funds thus collected for the upbuilding of the French film industry. With vocal films now occupying the commanding position in the trade non-English-speaking nations have an excellent opportunity to establish native film industries, a task in which American capital and technical ability will be glad to cooperate.



The Tariff Is More Than a Local Issue; It Is Now a Personal Issue.

HARD GOING FOR SHIPS.

There is more than a capful of wind in the atmosphere surrounding the merchant marine. In fact, the barometer indicates that a gale may be expected at any moment. In the offing is the controversy between the several lines flying the American flag and the interdepartmental committee which desires further instructions from Congress before executing the purpose of the act of 1928 which authorizes subsidies in the form of mail contracts. Those mail contracts are regarded as so essential to the profitable running of merchant vessels flying the flag that the Shipping Board is having difficulty in holding purchasers of ships to the terms of their contracts.

It is noted also that the announcement that mail contracts may not be awarded prior to the enactment of further legislation has had the effect of knocking off 8 or 9 per cent from the market value of the corporate stock of one of those purchasers. Something, or somebody, is constantly taking the joy out of life, and every effort on the part of Congress to build up a merchant marine worthy of the United States invariably runs into a legal gale or a financial hurricane.

Now the Shipping Board is at it again. The Shipping Board is the "holding body" for the Merchant Fleet Corporation, but they fail to function in harmonious relationship, without which it is impossible for two organizations to accomplish satisfactory results. The Fleet Corporation appears to believe that as at present conducted the cargo handling of the Shipping Board is altogether too expensive. It was found that this item of expense digs into the treasury of the corporation and the board to the extent of $12,000,000 a year. It is proposed to inquire into the stevedoring operations, with a view to a big reduction in the cost of the work of cargo handling. Chairman T. V. O'Connor, of the Shipping Board, opposes the inquiry and resents the implication that favoritism has been shown toward the holders of stevedoring contracts. But in spite of the objections of the chairman the Shipping Board, by a vote of four to one, has decided upon an investigation, together with a new form of contract, with the objectionable features of the present system eliminated.

Apparently action by Congress is again necessary if the merchant marine is to prosper. Congress should order mail contracts to be awarded to purchasers of Government ships and routes, if that policy has been adopted, and a way should be found to prevent friction between Government agencies.

FOR HEALTHY CATTLE.

One of the greatest accomplishments of the Bureau of Animal Industry is that in connection with the drive to eliminate tuberculosis in cattle. This movement has the earnest support of all public health officials, as well as of all meat packers. But it is perhaps the dairymen who are the principal beneficiaries of the work. Many dairymen at the outset were opposed to the campaign to eliminate disease, because they feared that heavy losses would result, but now through cooperation between the Federal Government and most of the States diseased animals are slaughtered and the owner is compensated in cash for his loss.

Far more important to the dairyman than the payment for his animals, however, is the enormous increase in milk production and the increased income per animal. The Department of Agriculture reports that on September 1 787 counties located in 33 States are now designated as "modified tuberculosis-free accredited areas." That means that there are today 219 more counties within the United States than there were one year ago in which all the cattle herds have been tuberculin tested, demonstrating that not more than five-sixths of 1 per cent of the cattle are in any danger of contracting the disease which was formerly transmitted to humans through drinking milk.

"The work of tuberculosis eradication is now progressing favorably in about 500 additional counties," the Bureau of Animal Industry reports, adding that "there is a good demand for surplus dairy cattle from herds located within the modified areas, and some of the packers are voluntarily paying a premium of 10 cents per 100 pounds for disease-free hogs from such areas, provided they are properly tattooed for identification."

Not only are dairymen wide-awake to the desirability of being assured that their animals are free from tuberculous disease, but the feeders of beef cattle are greatly benefited by eradication of disease. As for the packer, inasmuch as he loses the cost of every animal condemned, he will naturally benefit from the drive.

WATER VS. RAIL.

An article in the current issue of Railway Age asserts that "most of the railways are now more prosperous than at any time since the United States entered the great war and they are rendering better service than ever before," and raises the question: "What kind of transportation service does the public really want?" The following paragraph stands out:

> The service rendered by carriers on inland waterways necessarily is slower and more unreliable than that rendered by rail. It will not be cheaper than rail transportation if what it costs those who pay the taxes, as well as those who pay freight rates, is considered. Why, then, do so many business men constantly apply pressure to the railways in behalf of better freight service, and, at the same time, advocate large expenditures by the Government on inland waterways? If they really want and need the kind of service they demand from the railways they will not use the waterways, and the bulk of the taxpayers' money that is invested by the Government in the waterways will be wasted.

It is surprising to read such twaddle in a magazine of the caliber of Railway Age. There is no merit to the suggestion that railways and waterways are opposed. The fact that waterways have been largely overlooked in the development of the American transportation scheme should be as disturbing to the railways as it is to business. Without utilization of waterways it is impossible to develop an economic transportation system, and an uneconomic transportation system adversely affects the railways to as great an extent as it does all other business.

It may be, as Railway Age asserts, that the service rendered by waterway carriers will be slower and less dependable than that rendered by railways.

Statistics have been published, however, apparently proving that the speed of waterborne commerce compares favorably with that carried by rail.

Bulky freight, when moved by rail, must pay a premium for speed which is unwarranted. The assertion that waterway service will not be cheaper than railway may be challenged.

When developed, the waterways system will fit into the national transportation system in company with the railways. Waterways will reach into the sources of traffic, bearing it to the railways and increasing their prosperity. Many railroad men know that the development of inland waterways is in their best interest.

CLUBS

By VYLLA POE WILSON.

THE District of Columbia chapter of the American Red Cross expects to move from its temporary headquarters at 821 Sixteenth street northwest into the beautiful new Memorial Building to the women of the World War next to the American Red Cross national headquarters within the next two weeks.

This epoch making step in the history of the local Red Cross chapter will give it unequaled chapter headquarters where all the activities of this agency of mercy can be carried out in the best possible manner.

The building is a memorial to the women of the World War and will be used as a chapter house by the local Red Cross organization. The plan is to make it a model chapter house where various types of Red Cross work can be demonstrated to Red Cross workers from other parts of the country.

The Memorial Building is due in large part to the indefagitable efforts of Miss Mabel Boardman, second vice chairman of the District chapter and secretary of the American National Red Cross. Miss Boardman's far-sighted vision of the work of the Red Cross in the District saw that it would need permanent headquarters and that the World War memorial building could be used for this purpose.

The District chapter is always ready to serve with first aid ambulances at public gatherings and last week carried out its usual custom by stationing ambulances at pivotal points during the regatta. Besides a trained nurse each ambulance had a trained life saver on it for water rescue work, had it been necessary. The Red Cross personnel were in charge of Commodore W. E. Longfellow, head of the Life-Saving Division of the District chapter. Among those of the Red Cross personnel on duty during the regatta were William Dove, M. Thompson and James Carberry, lifesavers detailed to hospital boats on the river; Mrs. James S. Vance, Elliot Murphy, ambulance drivers; Miss Teresa Quinn, Miss Gertrude Burke, Red Cross nurses, and Jack Meaney. Miss Eleanor Wheeler and Miss Ruth Corker.

To Confer on National Defense.

Just what stand the Women's National Patriotic Conference for National Defense will take on the shipbuilding program for the United States, with which they have always concerned themselves, at the conference called for January 29, 30 and 31 at Memorial Continental Hall remains to be seen. At the meeting of the advisory board last week the representatives of 40 great national organizations of women cooperating with the D. A. R. and the American Legion Auxiliary discussed the National Defense program of the United States and decided to incorporate views on the pending naval situation in the call to the conference to be sent out in a few weeks.

The conference is called, it is announced, for the purpose of electing officers and discussing matters of national defense now before the citizens of the country and adopting such resolutions as shall be considered to have bearing upon the questions of national defense.

Mrs. Lowell Fletcher Hobart, president general of the D. A. R., will be the presiding officer of the conference. She is directing the arrangements for the conference.

Busy Political Programs.

That the women of the country will know what is going on from a national political viewpoint is an assured fact. All the leading organizations of women have arranged schedules of meetings and of broadcasting by speakers, expert in political subjects. The National Women's Party speakers will tour the country and the United States in the interest of their stand for an equal rights amendment to the Constitution. They will also use the radio as a means of communicating their ideas to their members and other women interested.

The Voter's Service program, which has become an important part of the season's work of the National League of Women Voters, will be continued this year, beginning on January 7 and for each Tuesday evening thereafter for five months.

The League of Women Voters is concentrating its efforts this year in providing its members with material for discussion of the major developments in the political world, particularly the new economic trends. It also is calling attention to the influence of women on Government, and the necessity that this influence be exerted by voting and expressing their opinions.

Many important matters pertaining to the club's activities for the coming season were discussed. All the chairmen for the year 1929-1930 have not been appointed because of their absence from the city. Those present were most enthusiastic and it looks as if the club was entering on its most successful year. Definite program for the year and other news items will appear at a later date.

At this time there will be exhibit of paintings and sculpture and a continuous art exhibit of the work of members will be held at the studio during the winter. Miss Hill is well known as an artist and educator and has had work on display at various public exhibitions in Paris, New York and Philadelphia.

Mrs. Edith Ogden Heidel, chairman of the playwriters' groups, is planning a series of lectures on the drama and she will also produce for the league the best plays written by members in which several people, well known in local dramatic circles, will take part, including Miss Anne Ives and Mrs. Maud Howell Smith. Prof. William Lee Corbin will give a series of talks on the drama, and a dramatic talk on her visit to England will be given by Mrs. William Wolff Smith. The music chairman, Mrs. Dawson Olmstead, has announced that a musical tea will be held the fourth Sunday in each month and two formal musical evenings during the club season.

The sewing is mostly for small children, but members of the club have brought to the section children's outgrown garments and "out-of-style" apparel of their own which has been remodeled and passed along to mission homes for distribution. A card party is planned for Thursday afternoon and evening of October 17 at the clubhouse. Proceds of the party will be used in the purchase of working materials. Reservations can now be made.

Members of the club are awaiting the opening of the dining room tomorrow. Extensive remodeling, with added floor space and a new entrance for nonclub members, has been part of the work nearing completion. Are your feet OLDER than you?

Give them this COMFORT and you give them YOUTH

It sounds strange—doesn't it? But it is obviously true: tired, aching feet—feet that dislike to be active—can age a young body and a young face.

Why? Because in Cantilevers they find freedom from foot pains. They find step-by-step comfort.

Walking in Cantilevers becomes a real beauty treatment; the foot muscles can exercise with every step, weak arches become strong again. Shopping with Bab

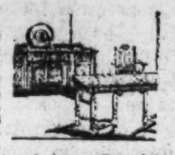
DEAREST GENEVIEVE:

If you are one of those who enjoy keeping up with developments, you must be rather busy just now, for almost every block in town has some new shop or shops to be welcomed and inspected.

New buildings have gone up as if by magic, and shops we have grown accustomed to seeing in certain places we find have moved to bigger and better locations. There is a definite feeling of growth and expansion in all the business districts of Washington.

Dulin & Martin's New Establishment

—has so much of interest on every floor. Nothing could be more attractive, however, than the displays of kitchen and pantry furnishings, to be found in extensive exhibits.



The vogue for furnishing your kitchen in a certain color scheme has brought out tangerine enamelledware, turquoise blue, delicate pastel colors, banded in a contrasting shade, pale green or daffodil yellow, as well as a pretty rose pink. Cooking and baking in such esthetic surroundings should be lots of fun. Complete sets of every imaginable pot and pan may be found in these colors.

The collections of molds of varying sizes and uses are too fascinating! Fishes, flowers, fruits, geometrical figures in tin, glass or china suggest the most delectable dainties.

Electrical appliances always intrigue one, as they are such time savers, and so convenient. You have never seen anything as cunning as the toy coffee percolator which I found there yesterday. It is made for a little girl to play with, but is being purchased by grown-up people who like to have such an appliance in a nonhousekeeping apartment. It has a little tray and creamer and sugar, and holds one or two cups.

To Know Where To Send Garments

—to have them cleansed carefully and thoroughly, without shrinking, spoiling colors, or in any way damaging goods is a great treat. The Connecticut Avenue Cleaners, which M. Ackerman has moved from his old location, 2604 Connecticut avenue, to 1734 Connecticut avenue, is an establishment you can depend upon.

M. Ackerman has been in business in Washington, he tells me, since 1908, and that's a long time. No wonder he has such a large following of pleased and satisfied customers.

Your best evening gowns and wraps will be safe in the hands of the Connecticut Avenue Cleaners.

Along About January First

—you will be so caught up on going to balls and theaters and night clubs that a trip far away from everything and everybody will be all you can endure. By that time you will be too tired to choose wisely or sanely a place to go, and, any way, by that time reservations on the choicest trips will be all gone. Your only alternative is to make reservations now on a palatial royal yacht which carries only 90 passengers and cruises delightfully to the West Indies. The yacht is the Prince Olav, and was not long ago one of the royal yachts of the British crown. Step in the C. C. Drake Travel Bureau in the Willard Hotel and find out all about it. Miss Moorhead is there all the time and Miss Persons some times.

English Bosom Shirts for Men

—are new at the Willard Shop, 1033 Conn. Ave. This is one of the fashions started by the Prince of Wales, and one which has gained in favor here. Arrivals in autumn attire for fastidious men include exquisite neckwear in silks which are quite different from anything we have seen recently. Scotch plaid neckties in the plaids of the different clans will give just enough spirit to a somber ensemble. There are numerous other patterns, too, which are in the special displays of the week.

Hats interest men the most just now, for the straw hat season is definitely over, and the new felts are too smart for anything. Don't tell me that women do not shop for their husbands. When I was in the Willard Shop on Friday, an Army woman was ordering several hats sent up to her husband on approval, and was making selections with great intelligence, too.

That is one thing about the Willard Shop, women feel perfectly at home shopping here. Men can purchase gifts for women, too, without stepping out of their own domain. A complete assortment of gorgeous new perfumes have just come in . . . Houbigant's newest "Essence Rare," the most delicious odor, in a cut glass prism shaped bottle, at $45 per, thank you, very kindly! Do not let this frighten you, however, as there are perfumes and toilet waters priced all the way from $1 up. Men's shaving lotions and face creams and specially blended perfumes are obtainable here.

You Remember Hearing Me Say

—that a Meyer Davis Orchestra was to be added to the attractions at the Cavalier, 3500 Fourteenth street. If I am not mistaken this will be made from the Club Chantecler Orchestra. You can imagine what an addition to the delights of the Cavalier this will be.

Mr. Mifflin Blackistone, the manager of the Cavalier, is simply alive with ideas for the comfort and convenience of his guests. The Cavalier offers so much in location, in the wide range of service obtainable and the moderate prices, too, are worth considering. Army and Navy families are attracted to the Cavalier. You may engage suites and apartments for a day, a week, a month or a year.

Mimi Has School Clothes

—which all mothers will be delighted with. The models are designed for wearing qualities and practical use, at the same time keeping the smart lines which present fashion's demands. I saw one adorable little outfit with a Scotch plaid skirt and a plain color blouse, with an embroidered emblem.

Last week I told you about furniture in this shop. If you will go up tomorrow you will see a beautifully made powder table, painted a rich green, which you will like. This could be painted in any color. Mimi, 1732 Connecticut avenue.

Vansley's, Inc., Have Smartest Models

—in street costumes, evening gowns and sports things. This attractive shop has clothes for school girls this fall, too, and the models for the jeune fille are every bit as snappy as the more grown-up designs.

A brown velvet redingote is trimmed in leopard and has a tiny muff and hat to match. A bright blue imported wool suit with blouse has a tuxedo collar of flat gray krimmer. One of the newest evening gowns is in chiffon lame, in gold and American Beauty tulle and velvet bow. Vansley's, 1726 Connecticut avenue.

The Huguenot Is Open Sundays

—from 1 to 8, and during that time serves their usual delicious table d'hote dinner or an a la carte menu, whichever you prefer.

On week days, luncheon, tea and dinner are served at the usual hours. This is one of my favorite restaurants, and the choice of hundreds of other people, too. The reason is a good one, fine food, charming surroundings and moderate prices.

With the first chill days, you may be reasonably sure of finding an open fire blazing on the hearth.

Specially Priced Winter Coats

—at Vincent di Francis, 1636 Connecticut avenue, present a wonderful opportunity for you just at this time. The special prices will continue this week only, and when you see the gorgeous models obtainable at $79 you will know this is the chance of the season. Seldom if ever do you find small prices this time of year in newest model coats in such tailoring as di Francis turns out, with wonderful materials and fine furs.

In the selection are rich greens, browns and tans, with striking black, handsomely collared and bordered in caracul, fitch or seal.

Canterbury Bell Is Open Again

—and what a pleasure to be able to step in this delightful cafe in Alban Towers and sit down to a meal perfectly served and so delicious that you have a feeling of great peace and contentment with all the world.

In the Canterbury Bell Cafe, Mrs. Blanche Carson Dougherty has accomplished a nearly perfect result. It is open all day for breakfast, luncheon and dinner every day in the week, Sunday included. Club breakfasts are 40 cents and 75 cents. Luncheons are a la carte. Dinner is $1.25, with the $2 dinner always available. On Sunday dinners are served from 1 to 2:30 p. m. and from 5:30 to 8. Remember the address, Alban Towers, 3700 Massachusetts avenue.

Rodier Fabrics At Betty Hanna's

—in one-piece frocks and in suits show the loveliest autumn colors. What do you think of the fashion for stripes in many colors going round, up and down, all in the same model? Perhaps you have not seen this creation as yet. The only models I have seen are in the Betty Hanna Shop, 1613 Connecticut avenue.

You must go in this shop often if you want to see the new styles, because the frocks and gowns come in and go out so rapidly that you miss out if you do not keep in touch with the arrivals.

Affectionately,

Society Buds Get Ready for Coming Season's Gayeties

Dame Rumor Suggests That Group May Be Split by Mothers Enamored of "Exclusiveness."

By JEAN ELIOT.

WHILE the powers that be are perplexing themselves—and the rest of the world—with the problems of precedence and precedent involved in the entertainment of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, prime minister of Great Britain, let's take a look at the prospects for the "debutante handicap."

Over in Baltimore it has long been the custom of those who write about society to divide the debutantes into the "gold spoon girls" and those who are not gold spoon girls. In Washington, of late years, the debutante group has been included practically as a unit in most of the big parties and in all the festivities especially designed for the younger set, although, of course, they have always broken up into congenial little coteries for smaller parties. However, this year there is considerable talk about a possible cleavage into two distinct groups—or perhaps more—it being whispered that some of the girls, or more probably their mothers, are to go in for being "exclusive."

Be that as it may—and heaven forbd that this scribe take any cognizance of such hypothetical dividing lines—this is certain to be a banner season for the buds. At least one Cabinet debutante is promised in Miss Gertrude Lamont, daughter of the Secretary of Commerce and Mrs. Lamont; and, although it was stated before she went home for the summer that Miss Caroline Hyde, daughter of the Secretary of Agriculture and Mrs. Hyde, would go back to school this year, the thought still persists that she may be included in the debutante group, at least during the holiday season.

MISS KATHERINE LOWMAN, daughter of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and Mrs. Seymour Lowman, is also to make her debut this year at a ball to be given at the Mayflower on December 23. And among the debutantes whose families figure importantly in official society are Miss Janet Ball, daughter of Mrs. Henry Winfield Watson; Miss Dora White, daughter of Mrs. Richard Aldrich—Representative and Mrs. Aldrich play 'round with the exclusive little "dancing class set"—Miss Junia Culbertson, daughter of the U. S. Ambassador to Chile and Mrs. William S. Culbertson, and Miss Helen Robbins, daughter of the U. S. Minister to Salvador and Mrs. Warren Delano Robbins. Moreover among those discussed as probable debutantes are three girls whose fathers are in the House of Representatives, Miss Florence Curry, daughter of Representative and Mrs. Thomas F. Curry; Miss Star Eaton, daughter of Representative and Mrs. Charles A. Eaton, and Miss Barbara Fort, daughter of Representative and Mrs. Franklin Fort. The present plan is for Mr. and Mrs. Culbertson to give a tea dance at the Mayflower on December 18 to introduce their daughter, who has already made her debut in Santiago, Chile.

The Diplomatic Corps in Washington will contribute at least two debutantes, Miss Loranda Prochnik, daughter of the Minister of Austria and Mme. Prochnik, and Miss Luica Tessada Guzman, daughter of Senora de Prieto, wife of the Military Attache of the Cuban Embassy. Then there's Miss Victoria Catalani, niece of the Counselor of the Italian Embassy and Signora Catalani. She will be presented under the wing of Mrs. Henry F. Dimock, Signora Catalani's mother, who "brought out" her elder sister, winsome Miss Dora Catalani, now Mrs. McClure Kelley, a few years ago.

MISS LORANDA PROCKNIK'S particular chums are Miss Laura Tuckerman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter R. Tuckerman; Miss Elsie Ekengren, daughter of Mme. W. A. F. Ekengren, and Miss Margaretts Bayard Wright, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Price Wright, and these four, who share most of their pleasures, are sure to have a "perfectly glorious" time. Mrs. Tuckerman is chairman of the committee for the debutantes' ball, to be held at the Willard on December 16, which, for the last two or three years, has been one of the important events of the early season and for which a large group of the debutantes are always lined up as subscribers. Mrs. Tuckerman is electing to have her daughter's coming out party two days before, with a dance at Tuxeden, her home in Edgemoor, on the intervening night, so that the young people's house party, which she plans to entertain, may conveniently take in all these festivities.

Miss Wright, by the way, is to come out in Philadelphia as well as Washington, and will be the guest of honor at a dinner party preceding the assembly. On this occasion Miss Tuckerman, Miss Ekengren and Miss Prochnik will be included with her in the party.

MISS CYNTHIA DAVIS, daughter of Mr. Dwight F. Davis, Governor General of the Philippines, will have a preliminary fling in Washington society before going out to Manila after Christmas to join her father, and Mrs. Davis has taken a house here for the season in order that her daughter may make her debut under pleasant auspices. Mr. and Mrs. Richard Wilmer Bolling will present their daughter, Miss Clara Bolling, who is a niece of Mrs. Woodrow Wilson. Dr. and Mrs. Gilbert Grosvenor will formally introduce Miss Carol Grosvenor who, after being away at school, had a sort of informal presentation last summer at a tea dance at Wild Acres, the Grosvenor's country home.

After a summer in Europe, Mrs. Frank B. Freyer is coming home all prepared to present Miss Engracia Freyer at a ball at the Mayflower on December 26. One of her special chums, Miss Frances Virginia Waggaman, daughter of Maj. and Mrs. Eunalls Waggaman, is also to be a debutante—if she comes back from the Orient in time. She went out to China early in the summer with Commander and Mrs. Willam L. McElduff and now has an opportunity to make a trip with them to Siam, Burma and Indo-China. It's an alluring prospect, but her brother, Mr. Ennalls Waggaman, jr., is to be married in November to Miss Virginia Belt, and Miss Waggaman wants to be home for the wedding. She is having difficulty making up her mind what to do and until now her family has not heard definitely as to her plans.

THERE is a persistent rumor that Mrs. William Corcoran Eustis will present Miss Edith Eustis, borne out by the fact that the Undersecretary of the Treasury and Mrs. Ogden L. Mills are giving up Mrs. Eustis' house in Massachusetts avenue, which they have been occupying. But the family is not yet in town, so she'll have to remain momentarily on the "tentative" list. Another tentatively mentioned is Mr. and Mrs. Fleming Newbold's daughter, Miss Nancy Newbold. Other pretty maids on the list of those who may—or may not—be debutantes are Miss Catherine Fechet, daughter of Brig. Gen. and Mrs. James E. Fechet; Miss Jeannette Fugua, daughter of Maj. Gen. and Mrs. S. O. Fugua; Miss Marian Wells, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Walter Wells, and Miss Virginia Glazebrook, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Larkin W. Glazebrook.

Miss Glazebrook will be formally presented if she is in town, but there is a possibility of the Glazebrooks spending the winter in California. She belongs to the "cave dweller" coterie in Washington. So do Miss Marjorie Talman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Fitzhugh Talman and granddaughter of Mrs. Benjamin Long Edes, and Miss Priscilla Totten, daughter of Mrs. Howe Totten, both of whom are in the debutante group.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles J. Bell are planning to present their granddaughter, Miss Marian Fortescue, generally and affectionately known as Rion. She is the daughter of Mrs. Granville Fortescue, but had been making her home with the Bells of late. They will probably have her coming out party at picturesque Twin Oaks.

* * * *

MRS. ARTHUR O'BRIEN will give a debut tea at Esta Brook for her daughter, Miss Caroline Roebling, in November, and later on a dance for young people. Then there's a winsome visitor, Baroness Astrid Ungern-Sternberg, who is to make her debut under the chaperonage of her aunt, Mrs. Albert J. Myer. Before her marriage to Maj. Myer, a son of the Gen Myer for whom Fort Myer was named, Mrs. Myer was Baroness Ungern, widow of a Russian diplomat once attached to the embassy here. The youthful Baroness Astrid will spend the winter with Maj. and Mrs. Myer at La Colline, their country home near Washington.

Miss Emiscah Gale Davis, fresh from several years' residence abroad, is to be presented by her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Percy Hamilton Davis, of Rye, N. Y., who have taken the house at 1708 R street for the winter. And there are several other newcomers to Washington with debutante daughters, among them Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Stringer, jr., late of Baltimore, who will present Miss Margaret Stringer; Mrs. Eric Swenson, of Colorado Springs, who will introduce Miss Greta Swenson, and Mrs. F. Bagley Wallace, of Detroit, who is to present Miss Esther Wallace.

Other debutantes for whose entertainment plans are being made are Miss Caroline Baker, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Gibbs Baker; Miss Catherine Berry, daughter of Mrs. Georgia Knox Berry; Miss Mary Parrish Bradley, daughter of Mrs. Joseph Bradley; Miss Virginia Cheatham, daughter of Brig. Gen and Mrs. B. F. Cheatham; Miss Eleanor Corby, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William S. Corby; Miss Eleanor Crain, daughter of Mrs. Robert Crain, who will be presented in Baltimore as well as Washington; Miss Eleanor Edmunds, daughtef of Mr. Ralph Edmunds; Miss Eunice Lee Evans, daughtre of Mr. and Mrs. O. S. Evans.

Also Miss Mary Caroline Henry, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel J. Henry; Miss Mary Ingraham Henry, daughter of Col. and Mrs. Guy V. Henry, of Fort Myer; Miss Jane Hanna, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Hanna; Miss Elvira Johnson, daughter of Capt. and Mrs. Alfred W. Johnson; Miss Susan Kintner, daughter of Capt. and Mrs.

Many Prominent Girls in Group to Be Presented.

Edwin G. Kintner; Miss Isabel Lamberton, daughter of Mrs. Paulding Lamberton; Miss Frances Morse, daughter of Commander and Mrs. John Wise Morse; Miss Janet Murray, daughter of Col. and Mrs. Peter Murray; Miss Rose Page, daughter of Mr. and Mrs Thomas W. Page; Miss Alberta Perley, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Perley; Miss Margaret Jacobs, daughter of Commander and Mrs. Walter Jacobs.

Also—take another breath—Miss Katherine Phillips, daughter of Mr. and Mrs Thomas W. Phillips, jr.; Miss Mary Ruden, daughter of Mrs. Daniel J. Ruden; Miss Caroline Sanderson, daughter of Col. and Mrs. Charles R. Sanderson; Miss Kate Hyde Scully, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William A. Scully; Miss Grace Moffet Stuart, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Roger Stuart; Miss Betty Thorpe, daughter of Col. and Mrs. George C. Thorpe; Miss Helen Walker, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Francis Walker; Miss Mary Martha Wrenn, daughter of Col. and Mrs. Clarke Wrenn, and Miss Virginia Yellott, daughter of Mr. and Mrs Robert E. Yellott—last alphabetically, but by no means least.

One of the earliest of the season's parties, especially for the debutantes, will be the tea which Mrs. William Laird Dunlop, jr., is planning to give on the afternoon of November 9 in the Chinese room of the Mayflower.

At the last moment, too late for verification, comes a bit of gossip to the effect that Mrs. Hamilton Wright is back in town, that she will remain through the winter and that she will present her second daughter, Miss Barbara Wright. Mrs. Wright has been much abroad of late, serving as one of the representatives of the United States on the League of Nations committee which is engaged in fighting the traffic in narcotics.

Mrs. Dunlop will invite all the season's buds to her party. When she gave a similar tea dance last year, with most of the popular "dancing men" asked as partners for her guests of honor, she lined up all the debutantes to receive with her and thus gave each of the men an opportunity to meet them all at the very beginning of the season.

A number of the debutantes are the special proteges of Mrs. Dunlop, as director of the Mayflower Social Bureau, which is arranging their coming-out parties. Mrs. Rose Gouverneur Hoes, head of the Willard Social Bureau, has an imposing group on her list. And Mrs. Helen Ray Hagner has still another important group under her wing.

Mrs. Hagner was the first to introduce to Washington the social bureau, which has become a veritable first aid to hostesses, relieving them of all the trying details of arranging parties and reducing through cooperation the confusion of dates.

French Publicist In Washington to Study Conditions

A distinguished young Frenchman, now a visitor in Washington, is M. Pierre de Lyautey, nephew of Marshal Lyautey, the hero of Morocco. M. de Lyautey is well known in Paris as an economist and a publicist, and he is touring Canada and the United States in order to study political and commercial commissions.

One of his missions is to help persuade the United States Government to send an exhibit to the great French colonial exposition to be held on the outskirts of Paris in 1931. The French feel that a rich contribution could be made from Uncle Sam's experiences in the Philippines, Porto Rico, Hawaii and other overseas dominions. While in Washington, M. de Lyautey has conferred with many officials.

Kiep, Charge d'Affaires of Germany, will entertain early next week, probably on Monday, in honor of a group of high German officials, who will arrive in Washington next Sunday for a short visit. Cabinet Group Are Due Back Coming Week

Longworths Probable Absentees During Premier's Visit.

The Cabinet group is a little late reassembling this year, several having taken belated holidays at the close of President Hoover's "vacationless summer." But the Secretary of State and Mrs. Stimson are in town, as are the Secretary of War and Mrs. Good, Secretary Adams, of the Navy—Mrs. Adams is still in Massachusetts, although her return "early next week" has been forecast for a month—and the Secretary of Labor and Mrs. Davis. And all the rest, apparently, will be back before Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, Prime Minister of Great Britain, arrives in town in October.

The statement of the Speaker of the House that he would not return from Cincinnati until the House reconvenes on October 14, has been taken to mean that he and Mrs. Longworth will be absentees during Mr. MacDonald's visit, thus relieving the situation somewhat in regard to the pressing problem of domestic precedence facing Government officials.

On the other hand, the return of Mrs. Edward Everett Gann, sister of Vice President Curtis, from Topeka, Kans., where she is now visiting, will coincide with Mr. MacDonald's arrival. She has been planning this trip to Topeka, her old home, all summer, her original intention having been to spend the month of September there.

Both at the office of the Vice President and among friends of his sister it was made clear that in going to Topeka at this time Mrs. Gann was not "running away" from any situations her presence in the Capital might create then or any other time.

Mrs. Gann has an engagement to address a group of club women on October 3, but said that she could cancel the date if it should conflict with any engagements in Washington.

No invitations have been issued as yet for any dinners in honor of the Prime Minister, Mrs. Gann stated, so she could not tell whether her plans would require amendment or not.

She was making no plans at the moment for the entertainment of the Prime Minister, she said, as she did not know whether a dinner and reception for him by the Vice President would be included in the program now being arranged.

She expressed the belief that it was "undignified" to raise the question of her social ranking in connection with the Prime Minister's visit.

Moreover, both the Vice President and his sister feel that the question of Mrs. Gann's place in the scheme of things was settled last fall when the diplomatic corps made its pronouncement that, pending a final ruling by "properly constituted American authorities," the Vice Presidents hostess should be extended the courtesies always accorded to the Vice President's wife.

Mrs. Gann—to digress a bit—has been spending the last few days getting her house in Cleveland Park ready for renting—should there be a satisfactory applicant. With such a comfortable apartment at the Mayflower there is not the running back and forth to Cleveland Park that was once expected. So the house, which is very attractive, might as well be occupied, so think the owners.

Secretary Mellon of the Treasury is the guest of his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. David K. E. Bruce, on Long Island, for the week-end, after "seeing off" his son, Mr. Paul Mellon, who has sailed for England to take a postgraduate course at Cambridge. But he is due back tomorrow. The Attorney General, Mr. Mitchell, is expected here October 1 and presumably Mrs. Mitchell will accompany him, returning from White Bear Lake, Minn., where they have a summer home. The Postmaster General and Mrs. Brown will be home this week from a trip to California and the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Wilbur are due about the same time.

The Secretary of Agriculture and Mrs. Hyde are also due shortly from their home in Trenton, Mo. Mrs. Robert Patterson Lamont and Miss Gertrude Lamont, wife and daughter of the Secretary of Commerce, now in Lake Forest, Ill., will come a bit later. The Secretary is spending the week-end in New York.

The Undersecretary of State, Mr. Joseph P. Cotton, who has been passing some time with his family at their home in Bedford Hills, is expected to return shortly to his apartment at the Wardman Park Hotel.

Japanese Navy Group to Be Feted Here

Officers of Sea Squadron, Due in Baltimore, to Visit Capital.

The Japanese Ambassador, Mr. Katsuji Debuchi, will be host at dinner Friday evening in honor of Vice Admiral K. Nomura, commander of the Japanese training squadron which is due in Baltimore on Tuesday and whose officers will come to Washington for a visit the latter part of the week. Many entertainments are being planned for the staff of the squadron and the Japanese midshipmen during their stay in the Capital. The two training ships, the Asama and the Iwate, have made stops at Hawaii and on the Pacific Coast before proceeding through the Panama Canal to Havana, which they left a few days ago.

The Ambassador's dinner on Friday is being given at the Carlton and the invited guests include the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Charles Francis Adams; the Undersecretary of State, Mr. Joseph P. Cotton; the chief of naval operations, Admiral Charles F Hughes, and other high officials of the Navy and State Departments, the staff of the squdron and of the embassy.

The Naval Attache of the Embassy and Mme. Sakano will be hosts at a reception on Saturday afternoon at the Mayflower in compliment to Vice Admiral Nomura and the midshipmen.

During his stay in the Capital Admiral Nomura will be a guest of the Ambassador and Mme. Debuchi at the embassy. Capt. M. Hibino is in command of the Asama and the commander of the Iwate is Capt. G. Suzuki.

Senora de Davila, wife of the Chilean Ambassador, will arrive in New York on October 8, having sailed from Valparaiso last Wednesday after a visit in her native country. She will be met in New York by the Ambassador and they will return immediately to Washington.

The Minister of Uruguay and Mme Varela with their daughter, Mlle Adele Varela, will arrive today in New York on the De Grasse, after passing some time in Europe. They will reopen their apartment at the Wardman Park Hotel the first of the week.

The newly appointed Minister of Ecuador, Senor Don Homero Viteri, accompanied by his wife and two daughters, will be in residence at the Mayflower during the coming season. They will take possession of their apartment at the hotel Thursday.

Senor Don Viteri will succeed Senor Don Gonzalo Zaldumbide, former Minister to the United States, who has been appointed minister of foreign affairs in Ecuador.

The Secretary of the German Embassq, Dr. Johann G. Lohmann, will go to New York today to meet Frau Lohmann and their young daughter, Lili, who are arriving on the S. S. Berlin tomorrow after passing the summer in Germany. Dr. Lohmann and his family will come to Washington the first of the week.

Administrator Of Dawes Plan In New York

Mr. and Mrs. S. Parker Gilbert Arrive for Brief Holiday.

Mr. S. Parker Gilbert, jr., who bears the imposing title of agent general for reparations under the Dawes plan, is in this country, with Mrs. Gilbert, for a brief holiday. They landed Friday from Europe on the Mauretania and expect to return on the Ile de France after only six days in the United States.

Apparently that time is to be spent in New York, although Mr. Gilbert may well run down to Washington for a day or two. However, Secretary Mellon of the Treasury, whose chief aid Mr. Gilbert was for several years and who has a great personal fondness for the young financier, is now visiting his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. David K. E. Bruce, at their home on Long Island and it is probable that the Gilberts will see Secretary Mellon there. It will be remembered that Mrs. Gilbert, who was Miss Louise Ross Todd, was one of Mrs. Bruce's closest friends when, as Miss Ailsa Mellon, she was her father's official hostess. Mr. Gilbert first became nationally known as Undersecretary of the Treasury and was hailed as a financial genius, a claim borne out by the success of his administering the Dawes plan.

At his own request Mr. Gilbert's name had been omitted from the passenger list of the Mauretania and his presence on the ship was not known by his fellow passengers until he was recognized some two days out by a New York banker. He has but three weeks vacation, but determined to spend it at home instead of France or England. The Gilberts make their headquarters in Berlin.

Mr. Gilbert denied rumors that he would take an important mission with the new Bank for International Settlements, explaining that when his work in liquidating the affairs of the Dawes plan is completed, he will return permanently to the United States, probably making his home in New York.

The marriage of Mr. Gilbert and Miss Todd was the culmination of a romance which had its setting in Washington, for Miss Todd spent much of her girlhood here, the guest of her aunt, the late Mme. Hauge. The Gilberts are registered at the Plaza Hotel, where they will make their headquarters until they sail for Europe on September 27.

Should they come to Washington it is more than likely that the Gilberts would stay with Mr. and Mrs. Richard Porter Davidson, who have just moved into their new house in Eighteenth street. The former Betty Hanna was another of Mrs. Gilbert's girlhood chums. She has recently returned from Europe, where she spent some time with the Gilberts. When she saw them last they were doubtful of coming home and their arrival surprised her greatly. Mrs. Davidson waited until Mrs. Gilbert was returning to this country a year or two ago to have her little girl christened so that the latter could serve as godmother.

New Country Club Nears Completion, Membership Grows

Work on the remodeling of the National Women's Country Club is progressing so rapidly that its quarters will probably be ready for use by the time the first meeting of the board is held in October. This will be called by Mrs. William E. Borah, the temporary chairman, for the purpose of electing a president and permanent officers. So great is the demand for membership in this organization that the limit has been raised from 300 to 800.

One of the major changes being made in the clubhouse, once the home of the fashionable Montgomery Country Club, is the enlarging of the veranda, which is to be inclosed in glass and used as a lounge. Above is to be the roof garden, which the members feel will be one of the pleasantest features of the club. Mrs. Louis McCartney Little, known professionally as Elsie Cobb Wilson, is decorating the club with that flair for combining the picturesque and the correct for which she is noted.

A beautifully arranged wedding took place Monday at 5:30 o'clock, at Sacred Heart Church, when Miss Dorothy Louise Harvey, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Barr Harvey, became the bride of Mr. George Edwin Chappelear, jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. George Edwin Chappelear. Mgr. Patrick C. Gaven officiated.

The bride was given in marriage by her father, and wore a gown of egg-shell white satin, fashioned with a tight-fitting bodice and a long, full skirt scalloped around the bottom and longer in the back. She wore a bridal wreath of orange blossoms with her veil of tulle and carried a shower bouquet of tea roses and lilies of the valley.

The maid of honor, Miss Margaret Dougherty, wore a gown of nile green satin, and carried a bouquet of pink tea roses. The bridesmaids were Miss Genevieve Beardsley, in a pale yellow satin gown, and Miss Grace Dila and Miss Elizabeth Lavender, who wore orchid satin. All carried pale pink tea roses.

The bridal party entered to the strains of the wedding march from "Lohengrin," played by Miss Mary Louise Sullivan. Miss Dorothy Wakefield sang "O Perfect Love."

The bridegroom, accompanied by the best man, Mr. Donald Johnson, met the bride at the altar. The ushers were Mr. Richard Harvey, brother of the bride, Mr. Edwin Pairo, and Mr. William Copenhaver.

A small reception for the bridal party and relatives of the bride and groom was held in the home of the bride's parents following the ceremony.

Annapolis Has Supper Dance By Moonlight

Beach and Tennis Club Event Outstanding During Week.

Special to The Washington Post.

Annapolis, Md., Sept. 21.—Moonlight, bay breezes, the dulcet strains of dance music, combined to make last Thursday evening's supper dance at the Beach and Tennis Club at Annapolis Roads one of the outstanding club events of the season.

Among those who attended was Mrs. William Laird Dunlop, whose party consisted of Miss Lalla Lynn, Miss Elizabeth Dunlop, Miss Mary Virginia Yellott, Miss Mary Martha Wren, Miss Mary Carolyn Henry, all subdebs of the Nation's Capital, and Messrs. Jack Sanderson, Binford Valentine, Frank Bastabel, Creed Cardwell and William Hart.

Mr. and Mrs. William G. Hill's guests included Mr. and Mrs. Joseph I. Weller, Mr. and Mrs. Morgan Beach, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Slaughter, Mr. and Mrs. Sydney Thomas, Mr. and Mrs. T. Pennebaker and Mr. and Mrs. C. Smith. Swimming as well as dancing was had until 11 o'clock. Others at the club were the Minister of Switzerland and Mrs. Marc Peter, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Georges Peter, Mr. and Mrs. A. D. Edwards, Mrs. Julian Gittings, of Baltimore, with whom were Miss Constance Peter and Miss Carroll Willett; Mrs. Elizabeth Buck, Mr. and Mrs. Hallam Claude, Mr. and Mrs. Dennis Claude, Mrs. Jonas Ingram, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Palmer, of Washington; Commander and Mrs. Hoey, Commander and Mrs. Detreville, Lieut.-Comdr. and Mrs. DeWeese, Mrs. Douglas Howard and Mr. and Mrs. Frank Ellis, of Baltimore.

Mr. and Mrs. Irwin S. Porter had as their guests at their cottage at the Roads, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Denley, of Rockville. Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Miller also had house guests. One of the interesting groups on the club bridle paths consisted of the Misses Dorothy and Muriel Smith, of Hilsmere, with their guest, Miss Betty Huyler. Miss Huyler proved herself a good equestrian as well as aviator. Her recent solo flight to Hilsmere from the Long Island Aviation Country Club at Hicksville, Long Island, has given local society here a thrill, and her appearance at the club last Thursday was the signal for all eyes to turn to the pretty little aviatrix.

Last Sunday saw a record crowd of golf members at Annapolis Roads, the course being busy from early morning until dark. The Beach Club, too, was thronged with fashionables from Washington, Baltimore and Annapolis. Among them, Mr. Truxtun Beale made his first appearance at the club since his return to his home on South River. One of the interesting groups on the beach included Mr. and Mrs. John Charles Thomas, the great baritone, sunbathing the day out with Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Stieff and Mr. and Mrs. George Stieff, of Baltimore. From Baltimore, too, came Mrs. Charles White and Mrs. Dabney.

With the three upper classes of midshipmen on leave, social gayety of the younger set the last week-end focused about the "panlo" given last Saturday afternoon in St. Anne's Parish House by the "Plebes," who enjoyed to the utmost their first taste of Saturday afternoon liberty. The dance was a big success, with many of the young girls of the naval reservation and town in attendance.

The members of the Naval Academy class of 1922 attached to the post-graduate school and the Naval Academy gave a dinner dance at Log Inn last Saturday evening at 8 o'clock. A number of out-of-town members of the class were also present, as well as quite a few members of other classes and their guests. A previous dance given during the summer by this class was a great success.

Dr. and Mrs. Roger Mermod arrived last week from Honolulu, Hawaii, to be the guests of Mrs. Mermod's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Dennis Claude, until December. During his stay in the States, Dr. Mermod is visiting a number of clinics, including that at Johns Hopkins University, the Mayo clinic at Rochester, Minn., and the New York clinics. Mrs. Mermod, before her marriage, Miss Margaret Claude, has many friends in Annapolis society, and needless to say will be extensively entertained during her visit. Mrs. Nicholas H. Green was hostess at a beach party Friday evening, when she entertained a few young people in honor of Mrs. Mermod, and of Mrs. Henry Martyn Baker, formerly Miss Sarah Green, daughter of Mr and Mrs. Green, who is here from her home in Long Island to pass a month with her parents. Mrs. Green took her guests swimming at the Annapolis Roads Club, and then the party went to Mr. and Mrs. Dennis Claude's beach at the Roads, where a picnic supper was served.

Miss Cecil Jewell, daughter of Col. and Mrs. Frank Jewell, who has been visiting Commander and Mrs. William N. Richardson, jr., at their quarters on the naval reservation, has left to return to her home in Washington. Friday evening Mrs. Clyde G. West, mother of Mrs. Richardson, gave a delightful buffet supper party in honor of Miss Jewell. There were about 30 guests. Mrs. Helen Ray Hagner and Mr. Jack Nesbit were the week-end guests over last week-end of Mrs. Guest in her apartment at the Cooper.

Dr. B. M. Knight Weds in Richmond Miss Gladys Gillett

The ceremony was performed by Dr Nelson Page Dame, assisted by the Rev. J. Keith M. Lee, rector of St Paul's Episcopal Church, Newport News, Va.

The bride was given in marriage by her brother, Lieut. Norman D. Gillet, U. S. Army. Her sister, Miss Florence Drysdale Gillet, was maid of honor, and Miss Mary Byrd Buxton, of Newport News, Va., a classmate of the bride at Hollins College, was bridesmaid. Attending the bridegroom as best man was his brother, Mr. Charles F. Knight.

The bride wore a brown velvet ensemble with hat and shoes to match and carried Pernet roses. The maid of honor wore an orange chiffon gown with a brown lace and tulle hat and carried a bouquet of yellow dahlias. The bridesmaid was gowned in delphinium blue crepe with a beige felt hat and also carried yellow dahlias.

The bridegroom is the son of Dr Benjamin Mitchell Knight and the late Mrs. Knight, of Winchester, Va., and is a graduate of the University of Maryland and the University of Pennsylvania.

Immediately after the ceremony Dr Knight and his bride left for a motor trip through the North and will be at home in Winchester after October 5.

Fashion's Fads and Fancies; What Milady Will Wear This Winter

Clothes Plans For Occasions Of State Made

Mrs. Hoover's Debut Dress Will Go to Museum.

By VYLLA POE WILSON.

SOCIAL schedules and clothes plans hold an equal place of importance in many official households just now in preparation for the first formal season of the new administration and the real debut at State functions of new official hostesses.

Just as their husbands are making history at their desks in the executive departments and in the halls of Congress the wives of officials and statesmen must do their part in social history, not far separated from the political record.

A former secretary to the President, wise in his day, the mentor of the outer sanctum of the Chief Executive, whose duty it was to keep his finger firmly on the pulse of public and personal sentiment, acknowledged that one of the first sections he turned to when he read his paper in the morning was the part telling of dinners, luncheons and teas. In these columns he read much he wanted to know not written down in black and white. He could tell who was friendly with whom, and who was going about quite a bit in Washington, and so on.

In this day of enlightenment no statesman's wife ignores the question of clothes. No more damning and far-reaching phrase can be wafted about the drawing rooms and boudoirs of the National Capital than, "She does not know how to dress." It even seeps through the door of council chambers and conferences and has a real effect on the lives and future of the individuals concerned.

Given Careful Consideration.

In recent years the motto "noblesse oblige" has led official women into giving grave and careful consideration to clothes. Some officials in this democratic country live on the salary of cabinet officers while, of course, some of the wealthy are called to serve their country in this high estate. It is a truism proven at practically every state affair that real clothes acumen is an asset in good dressing even beyond that of a large bank account. In fact, some of the women who have earned for themselves the reputation of being among the best dressed of official and congressional circles are not the wives of wealthy men at all. Their secret seems to be that they know when and how and where to wear their clothes.

In years when velvets and heavy handsome silks and satin are the mode, the clothes question is much simplified. These rich fabrics need little or no embellishment. Today, too, when the mode is designed to fit the individual figure, with all kinds of provisions for modification for the overthin or overstout, the too tall or the short, becomingness is possible of achievement.

Every one is waiting with deep interest to see Mrs. Hoover's gowns for the state functions for the British Premier Ramsay MacDonald as forerunners of the usual four state receptions and four state dinners of the winter season.

Practically every one of the first ladies of the land have chosen trained gowns for their grand entry as the social head of the Nation. This event has been usually the reception for the diplomats, the first winter of their husband's administration. This is a high point in their career. No one can gainsay the effect of a long trained dress against the lovely colonial stairs as the first hostess of the Nation leads the procession of cabinet officers and their wives in the grand march down the stairs across the corridor to the blue room.

Mrs. Coolidge Liked White.

Mrs. Coolidge made her state bow to the assembled diplomats and other guests at the first diplomatic reception of the Coolidge administration in a made-in-America white satin brocaded gown with a long separate cut court train. The first Mrs. Woodrow Wilson came down the steps in a dress of green and gold brocade, also made in America, draped very closely, much in the revival of the mode of today, with a long train in one with the dress. The second Mrs. Wilson wore a dress of black velvet, with a long separate train of velvet embroidered in beads, when she had her great moment in the social history of the White House. Mrs. Warren G. Harding was very fond of wearing well-fitted heavy white satin dresses embroidered in pearls and crystals and jets, and a train one of this variety was chosen by her for the first diplomatic reception.

In the exhibit of the costumes worn by the ladies of the White House in the new National Museum the dresses they wore at diplomatic receptions have an important place. Mrs. Coolidge gave her white satin brocade made-in-America gown to the collection, and this is regarded as a very happy choice. It is the gown in which Howard Chandler Christy painted her portrait which hung in the family drawing room on the second floor of the White House. Mrs. Coolidge announced that she would give the gown to the collection as a special compliment to her sorority, the Phi Beta Pi, with its pin on the dress. Mrs. Taft has presented the gown she wore at the silver wedding evening garden fete in the White House grounds, which was especially woven for her in New Jersey mills for the occasion, the motif of the design of the brocade being orange blossoms.

Which gown Mrs. Hoover will give to this collection remains to be seen. In the days when the inaugural balls were in order quite naturally the inaugural ball gown was regarded as destined for this final honor.

This collection in the new National Museum was the idea of the late Mrs. Julian James, of Washington, who purchased many of the gowns herself for the collection and spent many hours in arranging for gifts or purchases of gowns and in the National Museum arranging them in the cases and on the figures. While the hair on the plaster heads is arranged as nearly as possible to the fashion history tells us that the President's wives and daughters from Martha Washington to Mrs. Calvin Coolidge arranged theirs, the faces are all the same, care being taken not to attempt a portrait likeness of any kind. Of course, the figure must fit the gown. Experts in this direction have always been employed to give the best lines and the most grace to the dresses. When the former President's wife is alive her figure is easy to copy. Many of them, including the second Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, have gone personally to the museum so that the dresses might be shown to the best advantages and the figure really look lifelike.

In this collection of costumes are not only gowns of the President's ladies but of other distinguished women and the baby and children's clothes of great men and women. There are also collections of bonnets and laces which will mean much in the future in keeping the sartorial history of the Nation. Shortly before her death, Mrs. James secured from Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, for this exhibit, a lady doll with many changes of dresses and hat with which Mrs. Roosevelt used to play when she was a little girl.

Since Mr. James' death Mrs. Rose Gouverneur Hoes, whom Mrs. James associated with her in this work, has carried on the movements for preserving for posterity the historic gowns of America's leading women.

Mrs. Hoover in Flat Gray.

Mrs. Hoover looked particularly attractive one day last week in a dress of flat gray crepe, made on modish lines with a flared effect skirt and a cowl-like scarf collar. She wore with this a small black hat and carried a handsome black satin bag.

Mrs. Edward Everett Gann wore at a recent luncheon an ensemble costume of black satin crepe and chiffon, made with a softly flaring skirt and a three-quarters length coat. She wore a cross fox fur scarf and a small black felt hat with a soft brim slightly rolling in the front.

Mrs. Woodrow Wilson wore at a dinner in Japan a dress of black satin with long hanging sleeves forming slight trains at each side.

Mrs. Nicholas Longworth had on at one of the dinners given recently in Washington for her brother, Col. Theodore Roosevelt, Governor of Porto Rico, a dress of flowered chiffon, made with a dipped-in-the-back flounced skirt and surplice bodice tied low at one side.

Mme. Prochnik, wife of the Minister from Austria, is wearing for afternoon events a most becoming gown of beige and yellow and tan printed chiffon. With this she wears a beige felt hat with a rather wide, soft brim, turned up in front and drooping on the sides. She also wears a beige fox scarf.

Mrs. Maurice Thatcher, wife of the Representative from Kentucky, is wearing one of the modish fall dresses of chocolate brown crepe satin. With this she wears a small brown felt hat and an amber chain.

Mme. Paul Lessinoff, widow of the Counselor of the Bulgarian Legation in London, who is now living in Washington, wore for one of the events of last week a dress of white crepe de chine with a long white coat to match. With this she wore a small, close-fitting white hat.

Worn at Regatta.

Mrs. Frederick C. Billard, wife of the commandant of the Coast Guard, wore at one of the luncheons in connection with the recent regatta a dress of white crepe and a long white flannel coat. She wore a bright-colored kerchief loosely tied as a scarf, and her hat was a close-fitting one repeating the colors in the kerchief.

Miss Margot Couzens wore at one of the out-of-door events on one of the recent warm days a dress of old blue crepe, made without sleeves, in the approved sport style and with a deeply cut sun-tan neckline in the back. Her hat was a black felt, closely fitted helmet.

Mrs. Sidney Taliaferro has a fall ensemble for warm days of yellow crepe and wool. The frock is of crepe, made on sport lines, and the coat of wool with a scarf collar, with embroidered silk facings. Her hat is a small, close-fitting yellow one.

Mrs. James Couzens is wearing one of the fashionable gray gowns in flat crepe, made with plaited panels at each side of the skirt. With this she wears a small gray felt hat and a two-skin gray fox fur scarf.

Mrs. Goring Bliss was seen at one of the country clubs for luncheon in a dress of knitted silk and wool material in beige and a deeper chocolate. With this she wore a close-fitting small brown hat.

Miss Laura Tuckerman is wearing a dark gray tailored suit with a white, hand-embroidered flat silk blouse in tuck-in effect. With this she wears a tight-fitting black felt helmet hat and a large fox fur scarf.

Dress of Shaded Blue Chiffon.

Mrs. Chester Jones has a dress of shaded blue chiffon motifs on a darker background. With this she wears a blue coat and blue felt hat.

Mrs. Harold Smoot has an autumn costume of deep purple tweed with which she wears a lighter shade crepe blouse and a purple hat of brushed felt. Her fur is gray, matching the gray pumps and purse.

Mrs. John Walker Holcombe is wearing a dress of beige and brown chiffon with amber ornaments and a small hat of brown felt.

Miss Ruth Hitchcock had on one evening last week a dress of flowered chiffon of pale rose and blue and beige on a white background. This was made with a deeply dipping skirt and a soft molded bodice with a round neckline, wide on the shoulders.

Mrs. Morris Evans and her daughter, Miss Meta Evans, looked very attractive at the regatta. Mrs. Evans wore a dress of beige silk and wool-knitted material with a close-fitting tan hat. Miss Evans had on a dress of pale green crepe de chine and wore a close-fitting beige hat.

Mrs. George Mesta had on at a luncheon at Saratoga Springs a dress of white flat crepe with a coat to match with a high white fur collar on it. She wore a white felt hat and carried a large white bag.

Miss Dorothea Lane is wearing an ensemble costume of yellow and beige checked silk and wool material. With this she wears a beige chiffon blouse and small yellow hat.

Mrs. John A. Dana has a costume of gray flat crepe, with a full length coat of gray chiffon, trimmed with chinchilla. The dress has bandings of blue chiffon. With this she wears a gray fox fur and a blue felt hat.

Fall Suit of Brown Tweed.

Mrs. Alexander Gregg is wearing a fall suit of brown tweed made in a severely plain fashion. With this she wears a beige blouse with a pleated jabot. Her hat is a close-fitting brown felt one.

Miss Marjorie Mondell had on recently a dress of flowered beige and brown crepe de chine, made in a modish style with flaring flounces on the skirt. With it she wore a helmet-like beige felt hat.

Mrs. Robert Henderson is wearing a smart costume of tan crepe with striking conventional floral design in orange and green and black. With this she wears a tan felt hat with a medium brim bound in black.

Miss Mary Selden looked very attractive at a recent luncheon in a sport dress of white crepe de chine made without sleeves and with a vee shaped neckline. She wore a close-fitting white helmet hat with it.

About Clothes for Men.

The latest news from the battle front in the reform movement in masculine dress is that the Prince Albert coat was formally discharged as the mode de rigeur of ceremonial garb in Japanese court circles last week.

An edict announcing the requirements for attendance on the 1929 imperial garden party contained among other items the joyous news that cutaway or morning coats instead of the long frock coat or its Japanese equivalent, the haori-ha-kama, would be acceptable at the annual function. Rumor even hath it that soon morning coats will be the thing at formal receptions by the emperor, thus going European royalty one better.

For some time the dress reform movement for men has been rampant in England, and the Prince of Wales has encouraged it greatly by certain informalities in his own dress, such as wearing soft collars with evening clothes, adopting the comfortable plus fours for sports wear and generally arraying himself on the side of those determined to bring about what all must acknowledge is a much needed change.

Sir William Orpen, an Englishman interested in the movement, went our pajama wearing mayors one better in his idea of an ideal hot weather costume for men. In it the brave man would appear in a soft hat which somewhat resembled war steel helmets, a coatee of quite original cut and below that again a somewhat exiguous straw kilt of something of the same kind as that worn by Kanakas at Hawaii, while the legs were bare and the feet adorned with sandals. It need hardly be remarked that Englishmen did not adopt Sir William's proposal with any alacrity. Yet hope still springs eternal in the masculine heart that a better day is dawning for him, sartorially speaking.

The Supple Hat Mode

IN the first period of basic style change since many years it is natural and to be expected that hat modes should likewise partake of a new and unexpected character. Not that hats for next winter are sharply different from those of summer and autumn, but that they mark a complete liberation from previous trends and the definite arrival of the new.

After years of almost complete standardization of hats (and ruin for the millinery trade), the modistes have suddenly made an "about face" and presented us with models of every size, every shape, every material imaginable.

We see tiny hats, medium size hats and picture hats, in every material and combination of materials, but for all this assortment there are certain tendencies more or less common to all, and it is those tendencies that we shall try to point out for you today.

The Vogue of "Floppiness."

In hat as in dresses and other fashion items, suppleness is an outstanding feature at the moment. If an evening gown is of heavy satin, for instance, it must be a satin which, for all its weight, is softly undulating and graceful in line.

And so with hats. If it is a wide-brimmed affair, then it is of horsehair lace or extra thin felt or some other stuff which is distinctly "floppy." And as for the little hats, while they can not very well flop, by virtue of their shape, they might well be called "crushable," for they are just that—and we don't mean cloth sports hats, either. We mean anything from a smart street chapeau to a very formal hat for evening wear. And most of them are so shaped and of such material that you could fold one up and put it into your pocket without harming it!

The general shape is one which covers the back of the neck and often the sides, but which leaves the forehead entirely uncovered. For those to whom this forehead exposure is not entirely becoming, one sees many models, which have a tiny veil descending just to the aristocratic tip of Milady's nose. This relieves the severeness of cut.

The Covered Neck.

Sometimes it is the hat itself, which is cut low in the back, but often it is a row of trimming, such as pleated ribbon or satin.

The shape, which leads in popularity at the moment is the toque, most often made up of satin ribbon cleverly draped. Jean Patou ornaments these with a row of embroidered stitching across the bandeau in front.

Extremely alluring also, for the type of woman who can wear it successfully, is the bonnet, which has come as an inevitable result of the supple fabrics of wool and of silk now available to the modiste. These sometimes find their inspiration in the baby bonnet, sometimes the Charlotte Corday—and oftimes too original to be classified definitely.

The Cloth Hat.

Cloth hats for sports wear or morning are still popular, and the newest fabrics make them lovelier than ever. It is very much de rigueur now to have the sports hat and scarf matching, either both made of the same material or the hat trimmed in the scarf material.

Felt, which not so long ago was our "stock in trade" for all hats, has become a sort of secondary material, to be trimmed and incrusted with others. We see it combined with velvet, with flat furs, with ribbon, with woolen fabrics, silks and crepes, and every sort of material.

These incrustations and combinations are often extremely intricate and of great beauty of workmanship.

Trimming, in harmony with the general trend of the hat mode, is generally flat and fairly close to the head. Uncurled ostrich is popular for that reason and some models we have seen at Maria Guy's were covered entirely with these feathers.

The Color Range.

The vogue of red, orange and yellow in all shades is strongly reflected in the hat collections, although red is leading, with the yellows rather on the wane. Taking their place, as we have been predicting for several seasons, are the purples and violets. Brown continues to play a certain importance, particularly in hats using the flat furs.

Au Revoir!

Knitted Play Suits for Boys.

The young man of 5, 6 and 7 finds his style ready for him in the increasing vogue of American mothers for knitted play suits for their little ones.

The fad came from overseas, where since the war the knitted garment has swept into a secure place in the hearts of all. At the Pall Mall, the Champs Elysees or on the Riviera, American mothers saw how comfortable and attractive these garments were for young folk, and now they have adopted this neat, sensible dress. Chic, comfortable, healthful and long-wearing, they are everything that a mother could wish. Children can play in them to their hearts' content and still come in looking "dressy." A brush off and they are ready for company. They do not crease or wrinkle and have many other virtues dear to the hearts of mothers wrestling with clothes problems for their children.

These suits meet with the approval of the young boys who wear them, for they permit of athletic sports and fun without fear of meeting with a maternal reprimand at the end of the day.

SMART HATS CHALLENGE INTEREST AND INGENUITY

Sophistication Is the Keynote of the New Hat

Manipulation of Soft Fabrics and Flat Furs Produces Variety in Off-the-Face Models.

Mrs. Langley Porter
(The Fashion Coordinator)

WHEN the term "hat consciousness" passed into current speech a few years ago it seemed as though a phrase had been unnecessarily coined. For what woman is not acutely and continually conscious of her hats? She may be content with a frock which does not incorporate all the details of a new fashion; she may be apathetic about many of the accessories of her costume, but she is unable to ignore hats. She is conscious of them to a degree that makes her readily responsive to and even apprehensive of a new idea in millinery.

This fall has ushered in one idea that is completely revolutionary and a number of details which strongly differentiate the models now on view from those of the past few years. After a long time of static fashions in hats, the scene has suddenly shifted. While the various creators bring out some highly individual models, they are agreed in making a radical departure from the immediate past.

The present slogan in all quarters is "Hats off the forehead," which means a complete readjustment of point of view as well as hats. Eyes must accustom themselves to a new view of the human countenance under a hat. But the change is being eased by allowing some differences in the backward slant and by not insisting on the exhibition of the whole forehead.

Felt remains the principal medium for developing the new hats, but there are velvet models shown, as well as combinations of velvet and felt. Alphonsine has created a number of extreme models which not only slope back sharply from the forehead, but are fairly long in the back and often have one side wider than the other.

Agnes again presents her smart and useful little turbans which so many women have become accustomed to that they would not give them up. The new models from this atelier are fashioned of flat fur, which may easily be manipulated, and occasionally of velvet and of Rodier knit wool. Agnes also has made effective use of feather trims, and even has gone so far as to place a bird at one side of a hat.

Patou, Suzanne Talbot and Reboux come gallantly forward with new ideas also, including the baby bonnet of Talbot and such things as the double brim, one of fur and one of felt. Brims are folded softly back or split, but they rarely offer the slightest shadow to the eyes.

At first glance it might be thought that only special types of women could wear these hats, and a hasty judgment would be to the effect that only remarkably pretty women could attempt them. The actual fact is that there is enough variety in the models for every one to find something becoming. Their effect, taken as an influence in fashions, is certainly in the direction of sophistication, which is something within the reach of all women who wish to attain it.

Naturally, the more extreme types should be cautiously adopted, especially those which follow the contours of the head too closely, but the draping of the fabric does much to distract the eye of the observer, and the drooping side brims can be gracefully adjusted to the profile.

Taste and intelligence are requisite in selecting any of these French hats or the American adaptations. The time has come when, before purchasing a new hat, a woman should see herself in a triple mirror and study all sides of the question.

Reboux and Patou put their signatures to two hats which are exceedingly smart or hopelessly dowdy in accordance with the way they are worn.

Various Fabrics Contribute to a Decidedly Interesting Hat Mode

Furs and Feathers, Tweeds and Velvets, Metal Brocades and Gros-Grain Ribbon Are Diversely Employed.

WHAT'S in a hat?—to paraphrase for our own purposes Mr. Shakespear's familiar question. And the answer this season is practically any fabric with any flexibility whatever. Part of the infinite variety of the hat picture lies in the divers and numerous fabrics and combinations of fabrics which are being employed in their making.

Fur Hats—Fur Trim.

The fur hat, which used to connote something in the Daniel Boone style, has become a thing of beauty in the remarkable hands of Agnes, and she and other modiates are using fur as trim in interesting ways. Agnès in one instance has combined black and white galyak—the white is in reality a soft, creamy color—in a most enchanting turban. One side is black, the other side white, with an uneven dividing line. A twist of the white galyak is wound around and ties in a bow at the back of the neck. And lest the black and white of the fur be too startling, Agnes has embroidered the white part all over with black French knots, and the black fur with white ones!

Patou, in addition to startling the world of fashion with his new and theatrical versions of the long-limbed, high-waisted silhouette, found time to include in his fall and winter collection a number of hats. He, too, found fur an interesting medium for the swathed and suave new chapeaux, and created a most successful one out of galyak. He crushed a black galyak crown into a turned back brim of black felt, then pulled the galyak through in the back to make a kind of ruffle across the back of the neck.

Mado, premiere modiste, whose creations are noted for the quality of youth they magically incorporate, takes gazelle fur and felt and combines them in a chic small sports hat which she calls "Paddock." The front of the crown and brim are felt, in the back a piece of gazelle shaped like the back of a baby's cap, is inserted.

Frequently a hat is trimmed with fur to match the fur on one's coat or suit, providing that fur is a flat and pliable one.

Fine Feathers.

Discreet feather ornaments are appearing here and there. A package of small quills will be stuck through the band of a plain felt sport hat, or perhaps a pair of them, not more than 2 or 3 inches long, will be stuck through the crown. Small birds and bugse made of shining feathers are poised upon brims or crowns.

Not satisfied with plain feathers, Suzanne Talbot creates a turban of them and then gilds or silvers it. These gleaming little caps she presents not for evening wear, but for formal afternoon wear with black satin or black velvet.

Grosgrain and Velvet.

Grosgrain ribbon has been successfully employed to make many of the new fall hats and to trim others. As for velvet, it is more important in the hat world this year than it has been in a decade. Every modiste has a version of the velvet hat. They come in assorted shapes and sizes, although the small turban, with a long side or soft bow or uneven drapery to give it distinction, is the most important.

Tweed Turbans

Agnes, again, sponsors turbans of tweed to match one's suit or dress, suitable for active and spectator sports, grand for motoring, football games, in fact, any out-of-door activity.

That ancient and honorable among hat materials, felt, presents an unusual number of faces this year. In soliel it acquires a considerable nap; in hatter's plush it achieves a thick pile and a sheen; in vis-a-vis it is plain on one side and very sleek and lustrous on the other.

Reboux creates a felt hat with a long side. A softly rolled brim develops into a bow across the back.

Turbans are aligned with the new hat modes and felt shapes are subjected to unusual treatment.

The New Modes Vary

THE name of Agnes has come to connote turbans, for she has so successfully launched this type of hat that it remains over for another season, adapted to the new lines of the mode. The new turbans reveal the forehead in as uncompromising a manner as all the other new hats. They are made in such a manner that the rather shallow crowns can not fit down very far over the head, whether they are of velvet or the new Rodier fabrics. The velvet model pictured in the sketch above has a slight brim turning up from the forehead and it is drawn around the head to the back, where it ends in a smart and coquettish little bow.

This hat in black velvet is charming with one of the new velvet suits or equally desirable as an accompaniment to any afternoon frock or coat. One of its practical aspects is that it has the low, becoming back line and at the same time can fit snugly within one of the big enveloping fur collars which are beginning to be in evidence.

The other hat is of felt, which remains in the ascendant, especially in its softer and more pliable weights. The soft gathers, which give greater width to the brim and soften the crown, are notable features of this model, which follows the accepted lines of the moment. This Germaine Page model is one which can be adjusted in such a fashion as to be becoming to almost any type of face, as it avoids some of the harsher and more abrupt lines of the extreme hats.

U. S. Clerks Will Study.

Government clerks, availing themselves of the opportunity to study after office hours, constitute a large part of the applicants for entrance to the Spanish School of Washington, it is announced. The school will open its nineteenth year of language teaching October 1.

Hats So New and Different Require Careful and Painstaking Selection and Adjustment

In Knowing How to Pick Out the Suitable Type of Hat and in Putting It On at the Correct Angle Lies Success or Disaster.

THE symmetrical hat seems to be a thing of the past, except for the simple little sports models which retain a determinedly practical look. Gone are the even balanced brims and the small, close, fitting shapes which have shaded the eyes and obscured the brows. Gone, too, are the little locks of hair over the forehead which have done so much to soften features.

Now profiles and the contours of the face are exposed to the critical gaze of the world, so that the business of selecting a hat entails enough responsibility to require endless experiment unless one is thoroughly familiar with the outlines of one's face and instinctively knows what to avoid.

With the sudden eruption of a new fashion, people either rush in where angels fear to tread or become panic-stricken and stubbornly refuse to relinquish last year's models. But to cling to that nice little felt that seemed so safe and sane last winter, is to date one's self. It can not be done with any degree of comfort.

Inaugurating New Styles.

Fortunately there are certain types of women and girls who may be likened to "shock troops." They are usually beautiful or smart enough to take up a new fashion without fear, and they gradually familiarize the rest of the feminine population with lines that at first seem too drastic for acceptance. If you have seen a certain type of hat often enough on women who know how to wear it, soon you come to the view that you, too, can wear it.

The hats of this season constitute a test case. They throw fear into some, while others accept them joyfully. They make some conscious that their profiles are not perfect or their cheekbones are too wide of too narrow, while others either know that they can wear anything, or have an instinctive confidence in knowing how to put the new model on at such an angle as to obviate imperfections.

French women spend a long time in the adjustment of a hat. They realize that no single detail of their costume is quite so important and they are willing to spend the necessary time in front of a mirror before making a public appearance. And before that they spend long hours trying on models and being fitted correctly before they accept a hat. This habit will probably be imposed on American women through sheer necessity and it will be a long stride in the right direction.

Hats Must Fit the Head.

There are other things to consider than the structure of the face in selecting a hat, for when it is viewed from various angles it must conform properly to the outlines of the head If the crown is draped the folds must slope correctly and, of course, the back of the hat is always important.

But it is most important to consider the face first and foremost. There is little or no standardization on racial lines in faces as there is in figures. These hats of French origin must be fitted to the most diverse types in the world.

And since, of course, there can not be a different hat for every face the whole secret lies in the selection of a model and its adjustment. In the group sketched above are only two hats, neither of which is an extreme model, but they appear as though they were four hats because on the left side they are worn correctly and on the right they are adjusted in such a way as to sacrifice not only every claim to smartness they may have, but also whatever becomingness is in their lines.

The Art of Adjusting Hats.

Nor are the girls selected for these contrasting sketches very different from each other. The whole difference lies in the manner in which their hats have been pulled on and the brims adjusted. In other words the difference is, when it is analyzed, more mental than physical.

The hat which fits tightly over the head and is drawn down at one side with a pompom and is permitted a slight flare at the other, must be pushed back to admit a view of the eyebrows. Pulled down as it is on the sketch at the lower right it is like an extinguisher on a candle and it successfully extinguishes its wearer. It is no wonder that she looks disgruntled for in passing glances at mirrors or in the big plate glass windows which line the shopping streets of a city she could not fail to see that she is looking worse than she thought was possible.

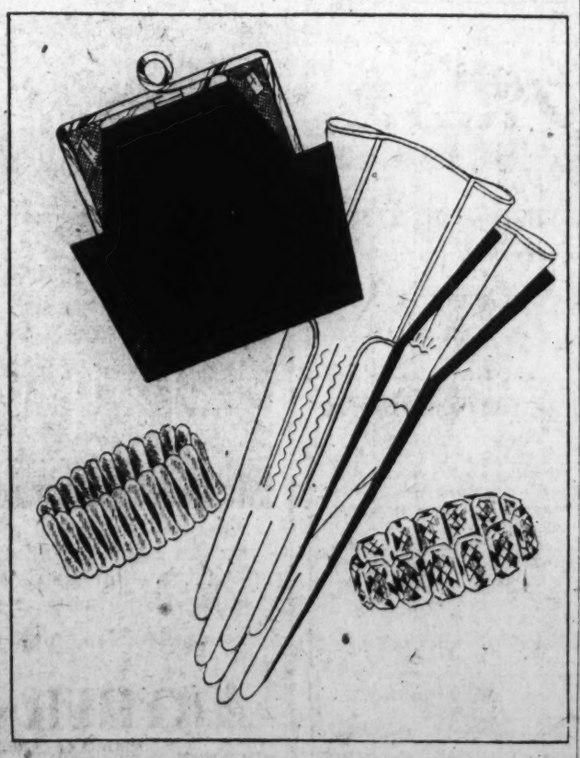
Her cleverer, but no better looking, rival has put on the hat correctly and the result is satisfactory. She knows that she is not only looking her best but that every other woman realizes that she is in the height of fashion and able to carry off the new models successfully.

More Sophisticated Model.

The model used for the two girls at the top is somewhat more sophisticated and for that reason even more difficult to adjust. The girl at the left combines all the smartness of an older woman with the charm of youth, while the one on the left has managed to look like a village belle of the gay nineties.

It is absolutely wrong to pull a lock of hair across the forehead, which must be left smooth, with delicately penciled eyebrows. It is possible though, to draw hair out at each side in such a way as to fill out hollows in the cheeks or to narrow the width of cheekbones. It is on such things that the sucess or failure of each of the models rests.

The moral to this fable is that patience, time and intelligence must all go to the selection and wearing of a hat. In the end it will be worth it. And perhaps having developed the proper attitude in the matter of hats American women will come to take the French point of view in all respects and be willing to wait for what they want and to be patient in doing it.



Gloves, bags and bracelets may join an ensemble or stand on their individual merits

Accessories Harmonize If They Do Not Match

WHEN the idea of coordinated accessories first broke on the horizon some time ago, everybody rushed out to get as many things alike as possible. Bracelets, earrings, necklaces and rings were rigidly matched. Timidity and lack of ingenuity tempted most women to adhere strictly to one color with a single variation. Shoes and bags must match, belts also, if possible.

The result was a monotony that was free from bad taste but at the same time lacked all the qualities of really sophisticated taste. With all the range of colors and fabrics at one's disposal it seemed a bit stupid not to experiment a little more. This impulse to experiment is now breaking up the unimaginative coordination of accessories, so that the various parts of a costume are now assembled in accordance with a larger idea and with more room for divergence.

It is the smart thing now to have bracelet and earrings to match, or a ring with the earrings, and either ignore bracelet and necklace, if the lines of one's frock encourage this omission, or else to find some different but corelated jewelry to finish the ensemble. Thus pieces are brought out singly or in pairs which tempt your sense of esthetics without putting too great a strain on your budget.

The Separate Bracelet.

The bracelets sketched in the group at the left stand alone and on their own merits and in either case it is easy to find the sort of thing which goes with them without repeating the design exactly. One bracelet is comprised of links of cut amber which has a beautiful sparkle and it is so made that it can be slipped over the hand without the aid of a clasp.

The other bracelet is of metal links and it, too is strung on elastic so that it can dispense with the bother of adjusting a clasp. An interesting necklace to accompany this bracelet would be one of the bimetal necklaces employing contrasting links of gold and silver.

A beautiful enamel clasp adds to the richness of the flat black antelope bag in the same sketch. An interesting detail is in the cut of the bag, which is shaped in such a way as to stand out in a rectangle below the clasp.

Apartment hunting is far from a pleasant task. Why not look in the classified columns of The Washington Post. Perhaps the very place you are looking for is advertised today.

The hat sketched above is the popular "Baby Bonnet" so adorable with the retrousse nose. It is fashioned of imported antelope suede . . . which material forms the tiny back bow . . . the only trimming. The price is 12.50. Sketched from the third floor of The Hecht Co., F Street at Seventh.

The Seven Dials Mystery

A Serial Story by AGATHA CHRISTIE.

THE STORY THUS FAR.

Gerry Ware is found dead in bed at Chimneys, scene of a house party. Seven out of eight alarm clocks placed in his room to awaken him are lined up on a mantel. The guests are told that death resulted from an overdose of sleeping powder. Jimmy Thesiger and Ronny Devereux motor to Gerry's home to tell a sister, Loraine, of Wade's death.

Lady Eileen Brent, known as "Bundle," finds a letter Wade had written to his sister making reference to the Seven Dials. Bundle feels certain that Gerry was murdered. En route to London a man, mysteriously shot, staggers into the road in front of Eileen's car. It proves to be Devereux, who, dying, whispers: "Seven Dials * * * tell * * * Jimmy Thesiger."

At Jimmy's quarters Bundle finds Loraine. The three of them set out to trail the murderer.

NOW CONTINUE THE STORY.

Bundle was silenced, but not convinced.

Jimmy proceeded to sum up methodically.

"I think we can say we're sure of certain facts. There's a secret society, with points of resemblance to the Mafia, in existence. Gerry Wade came to know about it. At first he treated it as rather a joke—as an absurdity, shall we say. He couldn't believe in its being really dangerous. But later something happened to convince him, and then he got the wind up in earnest. I rather fancy he must have said something to Ronny Devereux about it. Anyway, when he was put out of the way, Ronny suspected, and he must have known enough to get on the same track himself. The unfortunate thing is that we've got to start quite from the outer darkness. We haven't got the knowledge the other two had."

"Perhaps that's an advantage," said Loraine coolly. "They won't suspect us and therefore they won't be trying to put us out of the way."

"I wish I felt sure about that," said Jimmy in a worried voice. "You know, Loraine, old Gerry himself wanted you to keep out of it. Don't you thing you could——"

"No, I couldn't," said Loraine. "Don't let's start discussing that again. It's only a waste of time."

At the mention of the word time, Jimmy's eyes rose to the clock and he uttered an exclamation of astonishment. He rose, and opened the door.

"Stevens."

"Yes, sir?"

"What about a spot of lunch, Stevens? Could it be managed?"

Lunch for Three.

"I anticipated that it would be required, sir. Mrs. Stevens has made preparations accordingly."

"That's a wonderful man," said Jimmy, as he returned, heaving a sigh of relief. "Brain, you know. Sheer brain. He takes correspondence courses. I sometimes wonder if they'd do any good to me."

"Don't be silly," said Loraine.

Stevens opened the door and proceeded to bring in a most recherche meal. An omelet was followed by quails and the very lightest things in souffles.

"Why are men so happy when they're single?" said Loraine tragically. "Why are they so much better looked after by other people than by us?"

"Oh! but that's rot, you know," said Jimmy. "I mean, they're not. How could they be. I often think——"

He stammered and stopped. Loraine blushed again.

Suddenly Bundle let out a whoop and both the other started violently.

"Idiot," said Bundle. "Imbecile. Me, I mean. I knew there was something I'd forgotten."

"What?"

"You know Codders—George Lomax, I mean?"

"I've heard of him a good deal," said Jimmy. "From Bill and Ronny, you know."

"Well, Codders is giving some sort of a dry party next week—and he's had a warning letter from Seven Dials."

"What?" cried Jimmy excitedly, leaning forward. "You can't mean it?"

"Yes, I do. He told father about it. Now what do you think that points to?"

Jimmy leaned back in his chair. He thought rapidly and carefully. At last he spoke. His speech was brief and to the point.

"Something's going to happen at that party," he said.

"That's what I think," said Bundle.

"It all fits in," said Jimmy almost dreamily.

He turned to Loraine.

"How old were you when the war was on?" he asked unexpectedly.

"Nine—no, 8."

"And Gerry, I suppose, was about 20. Most lads of 20 fought in the war. Gerry didn't."

"No," said Loraine, after thinking a minute or two. "No, Gerry wasn't a soldier. I don't know why."

The Real Thing.

"I can tell you why," said Jimmy. "Or at least I can make a very shrewd guess. He was out of England from 1915 to 1918. I've taken the trouble to find that out. And nobody seems to know exactly where he was. I think he was in Germany."

The color rose in Loraine's cheeks. She looked at Jimmy with admiration.

"How clever of you."

"He spoke German well, didn't he?"

"Oh! yes, like a native."

"I'm sure I'm right. Listen, you two. Gerry Wade was at the Foreign Office. He appeared to be the same sort of amiable idiot—excuse the term, but you know what I mean—as Bill Eversleigh and Ronny Devereux. A purely ornamental excrescence. But in reality he was something quite different. I think Gerry Wade was the real thing. Our secret service is supposed to be the best in the world. I think Gerry Wade was pretty high up in that service. And that explains everything! I remember saying idly that last evening at Chimneys that Gerry couldn't be quite such an ass as he made himself out to be."

"And if you're right," said Bundle, practical as ever.

"Then the thing's bigger than we thought. This Seven Dials business isn't merely criminal—it's international. One thing's certain, somebody has got to be at this house party of Lomax's."

Bundle made a slight grimace.

"I know George well—but he doesn't like me. He'd never think of asking me to a serious gathering. All the same, I might——"

She remained a moment lost in thought.

"Do you think I could work it through, Bill?" asked Jimmy. "He's bound to be there as Coddler's right-hand man. He might bring me along somehow or other."

Interested in Politics.

"I don't see why not," said Bundle. "You'll have to prime Bill and make him say the right things. He's incapable of thinking of them for himself."

"What do you suggest?" asked Jimmy humbly.

"Oh! It's quite easy. Bill describes you as a rich young man—interested in politics, anxious to stand for Parliament. George will fall at once. You know what these political parties are; always looking for new, rich young men. The richer Bill says you are, the easier it will be to manage."

"Short of being described as Rothschild, I don't mind," said Jimmy.

"Then I think that's practically settled. I'm dining with Bill tomorrow night, and I'll get a list of who is to be there. That will be useful."

"I'm sorry you can't be there," said Jimmy. "But on the whole, I think it's all for the best."

"Im not so sure I shan't be there," said Bundle. "Codders hates me like poison—but there are other ways."

She became meditative.

"And what about me?" asked Loraine, in a small, meek voice.

"You're not on in this act," said Jimmy instantly. "See? After all, we've got to have some one outside to—er—er——"

"To what?" said Loraine.

Jimmy decided not to pursue this tack. He appealed to Bundle.

"Look here," he said. "Loraine must keep out of this, mustn't she?"

"I certainly think she'd better."

"Next time," said Jimmy kindly.

"And suppose there isn't a next time," said Loraine.

"Oh! there probably will be. Not a doubt of it."

"I see. I'm just to go home and—wait."

"That's it," said Jimmy, with every appearance of relief. "I thought you'd understand."

"You see," explained Bundle, "three of us forcing our way in might look rather suspicious. And you would be particularly difficult. You do see that, don't you?"

"Oh! yes," said Loraine.

"Then it's settled—you do nothing," said Jimmy.

"I do nothing," said Loraine meekly.

Bundle looked at her in sudden suspicion. The tameness with which Loraine was taking it seemed hardly natural. Loraine looked at her. Her eyes were blue and guileless. They met Bundle's without a quiver even of the lashes. Bundle was only partly satisfied. She found the meekness of Loraine Wade highly suspicious.

Bundle Visits Scotland Yard.

HOW it may be said at once in the foregoing conversation each one of the three participants had, as it were, held something in reserve. That "Nobody tells everything" is a very true motto.

It may be questioned, for instance, if Loraine Wade was perfectly sincere in her account of the motives which had led her to seek out Jimmy Thesiger.

In the same way, Jimmy Thesiger himself had various ideas and plans connected with the forthcoming party at George Lomax's which he had no intention of revealing to—say, Bundle.

And Bundle herself had a fully fledged plan which she proposed to put into immediate execution and which she had said nothing whatever about.

On leaving Jimmy Thesiger's rooms she drove to Scotland Yard, where she asked to see Superintendent Battle.

Superintendent Battle was rather a big man. He worked almost entirely on cases of a delicate political nature. On such a case he had come to Chimneys four years ago, and Bundle was frankly trading on his remembering this fact.

Superintendent Battle.

After a short delay she was taken along several corridors and into the superintendent's private room.

Battle was a stolid-looking man with a wooden face. He looked supremely unintelligent and more like a commissionaire than a detective.

He was standing by the window when she entered, gazing in an expressionless manner at some sparrows.

"Good afternoon, Lady Eileen," he said. "Sit down, won't you?"

"Thank you," said Bundle. "I was afraid you mightn't remember me."

"Always remember people," said Battle. He added: "Got to in my job."

"Oh!" said Bundle, rather damped. "And what can I do for you?" inquired the superintendent.

Bundle came straight to the point. "I've always heard that you people at Scotland Yard have lists of all secret societies and things like that that are formed in London."

"We try to keep up to date," said Superintendent Battle, cautiously.

"I suppose a great many of them aren't really dangerous."

"We've got a very good rule to go by," said Battle. "The more they talk the less they'll do. You'd be surprised how well that works out."

"And I've heard that very often you let them go on?"

Battle nodded.

"Look here," he said. "Loraine must keep out of this, mustn't she?"

"I certainly think she'd better."

"Next time," said Jimmy kindly.

"And suppose there isn't a next time," said Loraine.

"And I've heard that very often you let them go on?"

Battle nodded.

"That's so. Why shouldn't a man call himself a Brother of Liberty and meet twice a week in a cellar and talk about rivers of blood—it won't hurt either him or us. And if there is trouble any time we know where to lay our hands on him."

"But sometimes, I suppose," said Bundle slowly, "a society may be more dangerous than any one imagines?"

"Very unlikely," said Battle.

"But it might happen," persisted Bundle.

"Oh it might!" admitted the superintendent.

There was a moment or two of silence. Then Bundle said quietly.

Secret Societies.

"Superintendent Battle, could you give me a list of secret societies that have their headquarters in Seven Dials?"

It was Superintendent Battle's boast that he had never been seen to display emotion. But Bundle could have sworn that just for a moment his eyelids flickered and he looked taken aback. Only for a moment, however. He was his usual wooden self as he said:

"Strictly speaking, Lady Eileen, there's no such place as Seven Dials nowadays."

"No?"

"No. Most of it is pulled down and rebuilt. It was rather a low quarter once, but it's very respectable and high class nowadays. Not at all a romantic spot to poke about in for mysterious secret societies."

"Oh!" said Bundle, rather nonplussed.

"But all the same I should very much like to know what put that neighborhood into your head, Lady Eileen."

"Have I got to tell you?"

"Well, it saves trouble, doesn't it? We know where we are so to speak."

Bundle hesitated for a minute.

"There was a man shot yesterday," she said slowly. "I thought I had run over him——"

"Mr. Ronald Devereux?"

"You know about it, of course. Why has there been nothing in the papers?"

"Do you really want to know that, Lady Eileen?"

"Yes, please."

"Well, we just thought we should like to have a clear twenty-four hours—see? It will be in the papers tomorrow."

"Oh!" Bundle studied him, puzzled. What was hidden behind that immovable face. Did he regard the shooting of Ronald Devereux as an ordinary crime or as an extraordinary one?

"He mentioned Seven Dials when he was dying," said Bundle slowly.

"Thank you," said Battle. "I'll make a note of that."

Only an Amateur.

He wrote a few words on the blotting pad in front of him.

Bundle started on another tack.

"Mr. Lomax, I understand, came to see you yesterday about a threatening letter he had had."

"He did."

"And that was written from Seven Dials?"

"It had Seven Dials written at the top of it, I believe."

Bundle felt as though she was battering hopelessly on a locked door.

"If you'll let me advise you, Lady Eileen——"

"I know what you're going to say."

"I should go home and—well, think no more about these matters."

"Leave it to you, in fact?"

"Well," said Superintendent Battle, "after all, we are the professionals."

"And I'm only an amateur? Yes, but you forget one thing—I mayn't have your knowledge and skill—but I have one advantage over you. I can work in the dark."

She thought that the superintendent seemed a little taken aback, as though the force of her words struck home.

"Of course," said Bundle, "if you won't give me a list of secret societies——"

"Oh! I never said that. You shall have a list of the whole lot."

He went to the door, put his head through and called out something, then came back to his chair. Bundle, rather unreasonably felt baffled. The ease with which he acceded to her request seemed to her suspicious. He was looking at her now in a placid fashion.

"Do you remember the death of Mr. Gerald Wade?" she asked abruptly.

"Down at your place, wasn't it? Took an overdraught of sleeping mixture."

"His sister says he never took things to make him sleep."

Trouble Ahead.

"Ah!" said the superintendent. "You'd be surprised what a lot of things there are that sisters don't know."

Bundle again felt baffled. She sat in silence till a man came in with a typewritten sheet of paper, which he handed to the superintendent.

"Here you are," said the latter when the other had left the room. "The Blood Brothers of St. Sebastian. The Wolf Hounds. The Comrades of Peace. The Comrades Club. The Friends of Oppression. The Children of Moscow. The Red Standard Bearers. The Herrings. The Comrades of the Fallen—and half a dozen more."

He handed it to her with a distinct twinkle in his eye.

"You give it to me," said Bundle, "because you know it's not going to be the slightest use to me. Do you want me to leave the whole thing alone?"

"I should prefer it," said Battle. "You see—if you go messing round all these places—well, it's going to give us a lot of trouble."

"Looking after me, you mean?"

"Looking after you, Lady Eileen."

Bundle had risen to her feet. Now she stood undecided. So far the honors lay with Superintendent Battle. Then she remembered one slight incident, and she based a last appeal upon it.

"I said just now that an amateur could do some things which a professional couldn't. You didn't contradict me. That's because you're an honest man, Superintendent Battle. You knew I was right."

"Go on," said Battle quietly.

"At Chimneys you let me help. Won't you let me help now?"

Battle seemed to be turning the thing over in his mind. Emboldened by his silence, Bundle continued.

"You know pretty well what I'm like, Superintendent Battle. I butt into things. I'm a Nosey Parker. I don't want to get in your way or to try and do things that you're doing and can do a great deal better. But if there's a chance for an amateur, let me have it."

Again there was a pause, and then Supt. Battle said quietly:

Dangerous Business.

"You couldn't have spoken fairer than you have done, Lady Eileen. But I'm just going to say this to you. What you propose is dangerous. And when I say dangerous, I mean dangerous."

"I've grasped that," said Bundle. "Im not a fool."

"No," said Supt. Battle. "Never knew a young lady who was less so. What Ill do for you, Lady Eileen, is this. I'll just give you one little hint. And I'm doing it because I never have thought much of the motto 'Safety First.' In my opinion half the people who spend their lives avoiding being run over by buses had much better be run over and put safely out of the way. They're no good."

This remarkable utterance issuing from the conventional lips of Supt. Battle quite took Bundle's breath away.

"What was the hint you were going to give me?" she asked at last.

"You know Mr. Eversleigh, don't you?"

"Know Bill? Why, of course. But what——"

"I think Mr. Bill Eversleigh will be able to tell you all you want to know about Seven Dials."

"Bill knows about it? Bill?"

"I didn't say that. Not at all. But I think, being a quick-witted young lady, you'll get what you want from him.

"And now," said Supt. Battle firmly. "I'm not going to say another word.

Dinner With Bill.

Bundle set out to keep her appointment with Bill on the following evening full of expectation.

Bill greeted her with every sign of elation.

"Bill really is rather nice," thought Bundle to herself. "Just like a large, clumsy dog that wags its tail when it's pleased to see you."

The large dog was uttering short staccato yelps of comment and information.

"You look tremendously fit, Bundle. I can't tell you how pleased I am to see you. I've ordered oysters—you do like oysters, don't you? And how's everything? What did you want to go mouldering about abroad so long? Were you having a very gay time?"

"No, deadly," said Bundle. "Perfectly foul. Old diseased colonels creeping about in the sun, and active, wizened spinsters running libraries and churches."

"Give me England," said Bill. "I bar this foreign business — except Switzerland. Switzerland's all right. I'm thinking of going this Christmas. Why don't you come along?

"I'll think of it," said Bundle. "What have you been doing with yourself lately, Bill?"

Bill's New Girl.

It was an incautious query. Bundle had merely made it out of politeness and as a preliminary to introducing her own topics of conversation.

It was, however, the opening for which Bill had been waiting.

"That's just what I've been wanting to tell you about. You're brainy, Bundle, and I want your advice. You know that musical show, 'Damn Your Eyes?'"

"Yes."

"Well, I'm going to tell you about one of the dirtiest pieces of work imaginable. My God! the theatrical crowd. There's a girl—a Yankee girl—a perfect stunner——"

Bundle's heart sank. The grievances of Bill's lady friends were always interminable—they went on and on and there was no stemming them.

"This girl, Babe St. Maur her name is——"

"I wonder how she got that name?" said Bundle sarcastically.

Bill replied literally.

"She got it out of Who's Who. Opened it and jabbed her finger down on a page without looking. Pretty nifty, eh? Her real name's Goldschmidt or Abrameler—something quite impossible.

"Oh! quite," agreed Bundle.

"Well, Babe St. Maur is pretty smart. And she's got muscles. She was one of the eight girls who made the living bridge——"

"Bill," said Bundle desperately, "I went to see Jimmy Thesiger yesterday morning."

"Good old Jimmy," said Bill. "Well, as I was telling you, Babe's pretty smart. You've got to be nowadays. She can put it over on most theatrical people. If you want to live, be high-handed, that's what Babe says. And mind you, she's the goods all right. She can act—it's marvelous how that girl can act. She'd not much chance in 'Damn Your Eyes'—just swamped in a pack of good-looking girls. I said why not try the legitimate stage—you know, Mrs. Tanqueray—that sort of stuff—but Babe just laughed——"

"Have you seen Jimmy at all?"

"Saw him this morning. Let me see, where was I? Oh, yes. I hadn't got to the rumpus yet. And mind you it was jealousy—sheer, spiteful jealousy. The other girl wasn't a patch on Babe for looks and she knew it. So she went behind her back——"

Codders' Party.

Bundle resigned herself to the inevitable and heard the whole story of the unfortunate circumstances which had led up to Babe St. Maur's summary disappearance from the cast of 'Damn Your Eyes.' It took a long time. When Billy finally paused for breath and sympathy, Bundle said:

"You're quite right, Bill, it's a rotten shame. There must be a lot of jealousy about——"

"The whole theatrical world's rotten with it."

"It must be. Did Jimmy say anything to you about coming down to the Abbey next week?"

For the first time, Bill gave his attention to what Bundle was saying.

"He was full of a long rigamarole he wanted me to stuff Codders with. About wanting to stand in the Conservative interest. But you know, Bundle, it's too damned risky."

"Stuff," said Bundle. "If George does find him out, he won't blame you. You'll just have been taken in, that's all."

"That's not it at all," said Bill. "I mean it's too damned risky for Jimmy. Before he knows where he is, he'll be parked down somewhere like Tooting West, pledged to kiss babies and make speeches. You don't know how thorough Codders is and how frightfully energetic."

"Well, we'll have to risk that," said Bundle. "Jimmy can take care of himself all right."

"You don't know Codders," repeated Bill.

"Who's coming to this party, Bill? Is it anything very special?"

"Only the usual sort of muck. Mrs. Macatta for one."

"The M. P.?"

"Yes, you know, always going off the deep end about Welfare and Pure Milk and Save the Children. Think of poor Jimmy being talked to by her."

"Never mind Jimmy. Go on telling me."

Among Those Invited.

"Then there's a Hungarian, what they call a young Hungarian. Countess something unpronounceable. She's all right."

He swallowed as though embarrassed and Bundle observed that he was crumbling his bread nervously.

"Young and beautiful?" she inquired delicately.

"Oh! rather."

"I didn't know George went in for female beauty much."

"Oh! he doesn't. She runs baby feeding in Budapest—something like that. Naturally she and Mrs. Macatta want to get together."

"Who else?"

"Sir Stanley Digby——"

"The air min'ster?"

"Yes. And his secretary, Terence O'Rourke. He's rather a lad, by the way—or used to be in his flying days. Then there's a perfectly poisonous German chap called Herr Eberhard. I don't know who he is, but we're all making the hell of a fuss about him. I've been twice told off to take him out to lunch, and I can tell you, Bundle, it was no joke. He's not like the embassy chaps, who are all very decent. This man sucks in soup and eats peas with a knife. Not only that, but the brute is always biting his fingernails — positively gnaws at them."

"Pretty foul."

"Isn't it? I believe he invents things—something of the kind. Well, that's all. Oh! yes, Sir Oswald Coote."

"And Lady Coote?"

"Yes, I believe she's coming too."

To Be Continued Tomorrow.

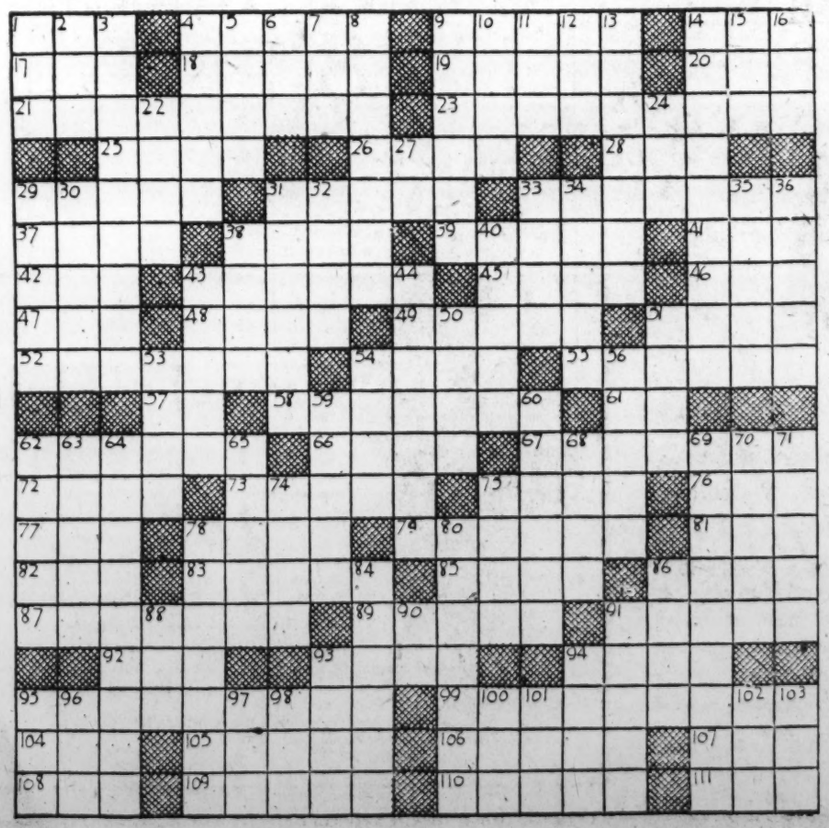
YESTERDAY'S ANSWER.

(Copyright, 1929.)



NOTES OF Y. W. C. A.

The regular twilight music hour of the Y. W. C. A. will be held this afternoon at Seventeenth and K streets on the roof at 6 o'clock. The program will be given by Flora Clayton, violinist, teacher at the Institute of Musical Art, who will be assisted by students of the institute. The staff hostess will be Miss Marion L. Meigs.

Further plans have been developed for the fall association conference of the staff to be held at Kamp Kahlert September 27-29 and for the joint conference of staff and volunteer workers to be held at the administration building, Seventeenth and K streets, on September 30.

The sessions are planned to bring inspiration and information to forward the plans of each department for the coming year and will include discussions and suggestions from the entire group. Since association interest will center about the work in South America because of the recent association pledge to support Miss Stella Orr, secretary of the association in Montevideo, there will be special emphasis on the plans for arousing international interest in the different departments.

The members of the staff will leave for camp by bus on Friday evening and will have a "get acquainted" party for the new members of the staff at that time. The regular sessions of the conference will open Saturday morning and will continue from 9:30 to 12 and from 2 to 3:30, followed by an outdoor gathering and a camp fire supper. On Sunday the sessions will be from 10:30 to 2:30 and from 2:30 to 3:30. Miss Helen Thoburn, of the education and research department of the National Board of the Y. W. C. A., will be the guest of the conference and the speaker at the different sessions. Miss Thoburn has had wide international experience and is particularly qualified to emphasize world relationships of the Y. W. C. A.

At the joint conference of the lay workers with the staff tomorrow Mrs. T. E. Brown, the president, will preside at the opening session at 4:30. A devotional service will be led by Miss Mabel N. Thurston. The theme of the conference will be on association thinking in relation to the individual, the community and the world. Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, first vice president, will preside at the dinner meeting at 6:30 when Mrs. Frederic Paist, former president of the National Young Women's Christian Association, will be the speaker. Volunteer workers are urged to register with the education office, Seventeenth and K streets, as soon as possible.

Miss Mary J. Wright, of the E street center, left last week for a month's vacation trip. Miss Ardell Payne will substitute at E street during her absence.

The staff of the Washington Association will entertain at luncheon tomorrow at 12:30 o'clock in honor of former Y. W. C. A. secretaries now living in Washington. Among those whom it has been possible to reach are Miss Mabel Turner, Miss Lois Kugler, Miss Abbie Kennedy, Miss Roslyn Lynn, Miss Edna Pyle, Miss Elizabeth Dean, Miss Helen Treudley, Mrs. Mary C. Stevens, Mrs. William Adams Slade, Mrs. J. Hillman Hollister, Mrs. Charles Sperry, Miss Marie Alice Bates, Miss Jean Campbell, Miss Katherine Willfley, Miss Chloe M. Leavitt, Mrs. Harry E. Hull, Mrs. Lorna W. Smith, Miss Ludema Sayer, Mrs. Harry B. Caton, Mrs. E. E. Danly, Dr. Agnes Conrad, Miss Helen Hudson, Mrs. Mary S. C. Leute, Miss Beatrice Hodgson, Mrs. T. R. Buchanan, Mrs. Roswell B. Daggett and Miss Annie Marchand.

Education Department.

Classes in speedwriting and dictation opened last week with a large enrollment. There is still time for registration in both classes.

The department is offering this year several types of service not included in the program in previous years. Among these is tutoring at special rates, arrangement for which may be made at the office. Extension classes will be organized anywhere in the city or suburbs in clubs, churches or institutions at the regular rates charged for class groups at the central building. Another service of interest to many is the very extensive file kept in the office of directories of schools and institutions.

Plans for the fall work of the music division are now being arranged by Miss Lucy Street, the new music secretary. Miss Pearl Waugh, director of piano instruction, has returned to the city after a vacation spent in Indiana and has resumed her teaching. Miss Helen Farrington, instructor of piano, has also returned from Charmian, Blue Ridge Summit, Pennsylvania.

Since the publication of the education prospectus a new class has been announced. This is one in human geography or ethnology, which is being offered by Herbert Krieger, curator of the National Museum.

Health Education.

The first term, October 7 to December 15, Mrs. Lillian Hoffman, of the Hoffman-Hoskins Dance Studio, has consented to conduct two courses for the Y. W. C. A. The beginners will meet in the gymnasium at 8 o'clock on Mondays. The advanced group will also be taught in the gymnasium on Mondays, but at 9 o'clock. Clog and tap dancing and natural dancing classes are scheduled for the fall term.

Saturday will be more or less devoted to children's activities in the gym and in the pool. A combination of gym, stunts and natural dancing is given little boys and little girls from 4 to 7 years of age at 11 on Saturday morning. Older girls, 8 to 12 years, meet at ten for their class work.

There are many who desire a continuation of tennis lessons indoors during the fall and winter. Classes are limited to four people and the course includes six half hours of instruction in the gym. The evening gym and swim class, on the schedule Tuesday at 5:30, has met with an enthusiastic reception. The morning classes meet three times a week for a half hour of gym and a half hour of coaching. The combination results in a decided improvement in health and appearance.

The new swimming class schedule is ready and offers a last chance for swimming classes other than gym and swim, on Monday, Wednesday and Friday mornings at 11. This is a second grade, side-stroke class. The crawl will be taught on Fridays at 10 o'clock from October 4 to December 13. The last two lessons will include the examination. It will be difficult and thorough work for those who appreciate the advisability of "swimming for two" instead of just for self.

B. and P. Department.

Plans for the fall and winter program of the business and professional women department will be formulated at committee meetings during the week. The program committee of the Blue Triangle Club, with Elizabeth Rowland, chairman, will meet on Monday night, while the program committee for the Tuesday Evening Club group will be held Tuesday night.

Chapters.

Mount Pleasant Chapter will hold the first meeting of the fall at Vacation Lodge, Tuesday. This will be an all-day meeting, and the members will take box luncheons with them.

The Phyllis Wheatley Y. W. C. A. will begin fall work with two new workers, graduates of Howard University, Miss Kathleen Romer as industrial secretary, and Miss Dorothy Baylor heading up the girl reserve department.

The education program includes short story writing, home beautiful, charm school, physical instruction, embracing dancing (esthetic and tap), swimming and reducing; current events, interracial lectures, music, languages, public speaking, dramatic expression, a series of lectures under social hygiene, clothes appreciation, poster-making, parliamentary law and Negro history.

Plans are being made to finish the building on the new camp site before cold weather. A mother with six children, the eldest about 9 years of age, and a husband mentally unbalanced, resulting from injury while at work, who missed their train en route for the South, applied for assistance. The mother and children were given shelter and food and accommodation secured for the man elsewhere. Difficulties were adjusted and in a few days they were able to continue their journey.

The sandwich shop, under Mrs. Edythe Sewell, will open formally on Wednesday. A song service will begin at 4 p. m. today.

AUCTION BRIDGE

The International Authority.

Bridge Brevities, a pamphlet by Milton C. Work, the world's pre-eminent authority on Auction and Contract Bridge, free.

This valuable pamphlet, containing concise suggestions for players of both games, will be sent with the compliments of this paper to readers of Mr. Work's articles who request it.

Requests must be addressed to Milton C. Work, care of this paper, and must include a stamped (2c stamp) self-addressed return envelope.

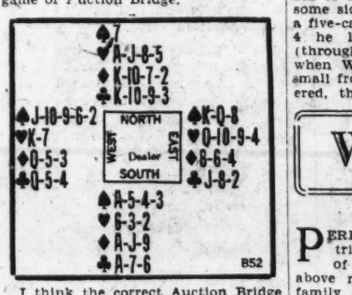
I am giving today an interesting hand which I recently noted in a game of Auction Bridge.



I think the correct Auction Bridge bidding with this hand would be: South one No Trump, followed by three passes. I do not approve of a following bid made over a No Trump with any such holding as West has. It is much better to pass and hope to save game, possibly to defeat the No Trump contract by leading Spades. With South bidding one No Trump and West passing, I do not think there is any excuse for North to bid two Hearts. The mere fact that North has a worthless singleton is no justification for his bidding a four-card major suit over his partner's No Trump; his partner may pass and there may be game in No Trump and not in the major. I do not believe in bidding a No Trump originally with a worthless singleton, but I do not let a worthless singleton force me into an unsound bid when I am the partner of a player who has bid No Trump.

When I saw the hand played, West made the bad bid of two Spades; and it would have worked advantageously in this case had North passed because South then would have passed too. West would not have made his contract, but he would have saved game at a comparatively small loss.

The North that I saw was a sound bidder and had a dependable South as a partner. They were using the winning convention which provides that a double is informatory when made of a suit-bid of two after one No Trump by partner; so North doubled (which he would not have dared to do if his partner might possibly have considered it to be a business double). East passed and South, understanding his partner's double, but having the adverse suit stopped and no four-card suit to bid, ventured two No Trumps.

Had the hand been played in Contract, South would have bid one No Trump, West would have passed, and North would have bid three No Trumps on a hand counting twelve.

In the play, West led his Jack of Spades. East covered with the Queen so as to unblock, and South ducked so as to exhaust East of Spades before developing the play of the hand. To trick 2, East led the King of Spades. South ducking a second time, South won trick 3 with the Ace of Spades.

The Declarer was embarrassed when called upon to discard twice from dummy. He needed his length in every suit, but wisely determined to discard two Hearts. The Declarer I saw play the hand took advantage of the information given by West's bid to assure himself that West had some side cards to justify his bid of a five-card Jack-high suit; so to trick 4 he led the Jack of Diamonds (through presumable strength) and when West did not cover, played small from dummy. If West had covered, the Declarer's situation would have been much simpler; he would have won with dummy's King and have had three commanding diamonds remaining. When the Jack won, the Declarer could breathe a sigh of relief.

To trick 5 South led a small Club and dummy played the Nine. The loss of this trick was part of Declarer's program. His scheme of the play was to be an effort to win four Diamonds and three Clubs, in addition to his two major Aces. This would furnish his most probable chance of game and to accomplish his purpose he could lose only one Club trick.

When East won with the Jack of Clubs, he, of course, led up to dummy's shortened Heart suit. Dummy's Ace won that trick over West's King and a Diamond was led, won by South's ace. South then led the Nine of Diamonds and dummy won two Diamond tricks. This was followed by a small club from the dummy, won with South's Ace, and then two Club tricks were won in dummy. So Declarer squeezed out a game, helped a little by West's bid. But even without that bid, Declarer's sound play would have been as outlined above.

Wives of Tomorrow

By FRANCES M'DONALD

"The Family Friend."

PERHAPS one of the oldest of triangle problems is the problem of the "family friend." Trusted, above reproach, almost part of the family circle, this third person invariably looms as a potential source of difficulty. Today it is Pauline who has just discovered the possibilities involved and who wisely asks, "Is it worth even the chance of discord?" Read Pauline's sensible little letter and, if you are young, just married and sometimes "blue," try to imitate and emulate Pauline's balance and sound reasoning:

"I am only 23, just married, terribly in love, but just so blue sometimes. I used to have such gorgeous times before I got married. You know, some little party or date every single night. Now—well, now we can't afford to spend a cent, and he, poor darling, works nights down at Dad's store so that we can even 'get by.'

"I've been so blue the last six months, sitting home all alone day and night, that he sugested recently that I look up some of the crowd and take in an occasional party even if he could not.

"I did so, and a very good friend of the family and his very best pal has been seeing me home. Now please don't think me conceited or suspicious when I say that lately I have just had the feeling that this really true friend has begun to look forward to these dates. Now

Music Notes

By ELISABETH E. POE.

WITH the Pan-American Union musical season open, the festival of chamber music at the Library of Congress an event of early October and impressive programs by world famous artists scheduled by Washington impresarios for this fall the National Capital has many attractions for the music lovers just now.

In connection with the Library of Congress concerts it is interesting to note that Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, the generous donor of the chamber music auditorium in that building, has planned to send George Barrere, the noted flutist, to perform the prize-winning composition to be given its premiere at the forthcoming festival to many European cities to perform this work of a young Czech composer.

Thus the work at the Library of Congress becomes of international interest and will do much to win for the United States a coveted place among the musical nations of the world.

The festival of chamber music will bring noted musicians and composers to the Capital and if the usual broadcasting arrangements are carried out a much larger audience than those able to be physically present in the rather small chamber music auditorium will be able to hear these unusual programs.

A number of Washington musicians have accepted service on the committee headed by S. Percy Foster to pick the District winner in the third national radio audition conducted by the Atwater Kent Foundation this fall. Inasmuch as a Washington girl, Miss Hazel Arth, captured the 1928 audition last year, local contestants are eager for the try-out in the hopes of repeating that success.

The fall business meeting of the Chaminade Glee Club will be held Wednesday at 8 p. m., at the home of the director, Miss Esther Linkins, 3615 Newark street northwest.

The first rehearsal of the season will be held Wednesday, October 2, at 7:45 p. m., at the Institute of Musical Art, Eighteenth and I streets northwest, and all young women interested in choral music are cordially invited to visit the club.

Elena de Sayn, violinist, and Grace Porter Carroll, pianist, of Asheville, N. C., will give two different programs at one hour each on Firday night at 8:30 o'clock and Saturday afternoon at 4:45. These two concerts are open to the public and will be held at Miss de Sayn's Studio at 1705 K street. Compositions of Schuett, Richard Strauss, Cesar Franck, Bach, Grieg and Debussy will be performed.

Margaret Davis, organ pupil at the Hamline School of Music under Edith B. Athey and District winner in the organ group of the spring contest held by the Federation of Music Clubs, has been appointed organist at Eldbrooke M. E. Church.

Senor Armando Jannuzzi, dramatic tenor with the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, will come to Washington to live. Senor Januzzi received his entire musical education in Italy, finishing at La Scala, in Milan.

Estelle Wentworth, who, with her mother, Mrs. George O. Wentworth, has been spending her vacation partly in Westchester County, New York, and partly at Virginia Beach, has returned to the city.

Ethel Hoffman Kane arrived in Washington last Tuesday after a three months' tour of Europe, where, with Katharine Heald, she has been visiting many centers of "the dance" as an adjunct to her studio work in Washington in motor-mental-rhythmics. Mrs. Kane will reopen her studio October 1.

Mrs. Kane and Miss Heald returned by way of Montreal, Canada. They had a feast of grand opera in Munich and Paris, and saw the novel revolving stage of Max Reinhardt, as adapted to a Johann Strauss operetta in Berlin.

The Mary Wigman School of the Dance in Dresden and the Elizabeth Duncan School in Salzburg were special points of interest included in a tour that extended from southern Italy into Germany, as far East as Prague in Bohemia, then on to Paris and London, with many by-paths along this famous route of art.

The soloist at the German service at Concordia Lutheran Church, Twentieth and G streets northwest, Sunday morning will be William G. Naehle. At the English service at 11:15 a. m., H. Clifford Adams, tenor, will sing, "I Heard the Voice of Jesus Say," by Harris. The choir will sing the "Venite" of Dudley Buck.

One hundred and eighty were heard, but only twenty were chosen for the Society of the Friends of Music chorus in New York in the first three auditions for new members, it was announced yesterday. More auditions will be held this week to obtain the fifteen more singers who are still needed to bring the chorus up to 140 voices—the enlargement of the chorus being a part of the expansion program of the society for the coming season in Mecca Auditorium.

The Columbia Music Co., of this city, has issued Folias de Espana, by Ferdinand Sor, and compositions and arrangements by Sophocles T. Papas, both for guitar. Folias is the name of an old Spanish dance and this has four variations based on the dance theme and has been made popular by Andres Segovia, the great Spanish guitarist, who plays it frequently in his concerts. Most of the compositions and arrangements by Papas, included in his new collection, have been heard by Washingtonians at his concerts and over the radio and have received favorable comment.

City Club to Present Sunday Night Movies

Among the added features of the City Club's program during the fall and winter will be Sunday night motion pictures, H. J. Odenthal, executive secretary, announces. They will be presented under the direction of Robert Smeltzer, vice chairman of the entertainment committee in charge of motion picture entertainment.

Each Sunday night for 32 weeks a special feature picture will be shown. The first picture will be shown Sunday, October 6, at 7:30 o'clock. The film will be Robert J. Flaherty's Arctic feature, "Nanook of the North." A Grantland Rice Sportlight entitled "Golf" and a two-reel Max Davidson comedy will complete the opening bill.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

COLUMBUS ALUMNI PLEDGING SUPPORT

Athletic Movement Is Backed at Meeting of Graduates of School.

ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT

Pledging support to the athletic movement and the university's new publication, the Skipper, some 50 members of the Alumni Association of Columbus University met on Monday evening at 1314 Massachusetts avenue and listened to addresses outlining the plans of the administration for the future development of the institution.

Called to order under the chairmanship of Francis P. Brassor, the association's president, the organization heard Dr. Charles W. Darr, president of Columbus University, pay high tribute to the work of the alumni. He stressed the scholarship the university is attaining by directing attention to the high percentage of its students that passed the June, 1929, bar examination in the District of Columbia.

Sefton Darr, assistant dean of the school of law, told the alumni that the renovated library is for their use as well as for the undergraduates. Explaining the new post-graduate courses being offered this year for the first time, the assistant dean urged the alumni to enroll for them to be better prepared to accept any specialized opportunities that might arise in their future law practice. Columbus University is taking care of its graduates by placing them in positions that become available at the institution, Mr. Darr said.

Open This Week.

Officials of Columbus University, 1314 Massachusetts avenue, yesterday expressed themselves as well pleased with the registration that has been going forward the past week, in preparation for the opening of the schools of law and accountancy that will take place this week. Tomorrow evening at 6 o'clock the school of law will officially open, with addresses scheduled by Dr. Charles W. Darr, president of the university, and other authorities.

Representatives of various student organizations will address the first assembly of the academic year of 1930 and brief speeches of welcome will be made to new students. The post-graduate courses will be explained and announcements made concerning the Skipper, the university's new publication, scheduled to appear for the first time on October 1.

Dean to Make Address.

The school of accountancy will open on Tuesday evening at 7 o'clock. Dr. Francis J. Hemelt, dean of the school, will deliver an address and officials of the Venetian Society, named for the pioneer accountants of Venice, will explain the aims of this accounting club of the university.

Miss Mary A. Warren, the university's registrar, reports that the registration this year is in advance of that for the last year and that the post-graduate courses, being offered for the first time, are proving popular.

Columbus University stickers, in the university's colors, crimson and gold, and fashioned after the coat of arms of Christoper Columbus, were distributed last week through the mail. These are being placed in automobiles, to carry the name of the university afar.

Condensed Mathematics Is Offered by School

A new condensed practical course in mathematics is being added this year to the curriculum of the engineering department of the Columbia School of Drafting and Engineering, Prof. Roy C. Claflin, president, announces.

This course is designed to give a student an opportunity to obtain a thorough and practical training in mathematics in the shortest possible time. It will include algebra, geometry, trignometery, logarithms and slide rule.

The classes in this course will meet in the evening from 7:30 to 9:30 o'clock and will open September 30. Candidates for the complete course must be enrolled before that date.

Foreign Student Adviser Established at G. W. U.

William Stutt Holt Appointed to Post, First of Its Kind Created in an American Institution; Registration Begun; Faculties Meet.

In the interest of its many students from abroad, the George Washington University has established the office of advisor to students from foreign countries and appointed thereto William Stull Holt.

Prof. Holt will advise foreign students upon academic problems, will counsel them in their individual and group social and extracurricular activities and, in general, will assist them to make a propitious adjustment to the university environment.

It is believed that the George Washington University is the first institution of higher learning in the United States to establish such an office. This is one of the functions of the university, in connection with the work in foreign service, which has been made possible by the benefactions of the National League of Masonic Clubs.

The group of foreign students who come to the Nation's Capital to pursue their education at the George Washington University is large and diversified, more than 40 countries being represented. To insure that young people from these diverse cultures shall gain the most from study at the University, both in academic achievement and understanding of American ideals and institutions, the administration feels that they should have as counsellor a person of broad sympathies and with an intimate knowledge of international affairs. Prof. Holt is well fitted for the post. A specialist in the field of history and political science, he has made a close study of the foreign relations of the United States, and has lived and traveled extensively abroad. He holds the degrees of A. B. from Cornell University, A. M. from George Washington University and Ph. D. from Johns Hopkins University.

Registration for the fall term at the university opened yesterday, with a large enrollment indicated at the end of the first registration day. Students may register through Tuesday, and classes will resume Wednesday. The new year is marked by numerous additions to the faculty, enlargement of the curriculum and improvement in the physical plant of the university. The administrative policy is stressing personal relationships within the institution, with particular attention to student personnel administration.

The creation of a new curriculum group under the bachelor of arts degree, offering opportunity for the student preparing for business to major in accounting and business administration, is one of the important course developments. This course includes, in addition to basic work in English, modern languages, history and political science, specialized subjects such as accounting, money and banking, corporation finance, commerce, commercial geography, business organization and management, marketing, commercial and maritime law, federal taxation, investments, international finance and insurance.

Another curriculum development is the establishment of the department of public speaking under the endowment of Mrs. Chauncey M. Depew. Courses offered in the department embrace the wide field of public speaking and oratory. Ceremonies marking the formal opening of the department will be delayed until Mrs. Depew's return from Europe.

In the school of education special work in elementary education is being offered under Dr. William Cullen French, newly appointed professor of education. Dr. French will give courses in elementary school curriculum, elementary school supervision, the psychology of elementary school subjects and a graduate course in elementary education. Other courses in education include adult education, Americanization, parent-teacher movement, child development, educational sociology, the exceptional child and tests and measurements. Dr. Frank W. Ballou, superintendent of schools of the District, will continue to guide advanced students who have research problems to work out in the Washington public schools. In the graduate field courses are offered in high school supervision, psychiatric problems of child development; problems in elementary education; problems in secondary education; movements in higher education, and research problems in public school education. Courses for teachers are offered in the department of home economics under Dr. Louise Stanley, of the Department of Agriculture, consulting director, and Frances Kirkpatrick, assistant professor of home economics.

Through its department of sociology the university offers, in addition to basic work in sociology, specialized courses dealing with sociology in its civic applications, designed to assist the social worker in his contact with modern social problems. The social worker who desires to acquaint himself with the history of sociological thought, and to acquire administrative skill, is afforded an opportunity to acquire broad knowledge and technical training in the field. The curriculum of the department includes courses in educational sociology, experimental sociology, urban sociology, city planning, culture and social progress, social psychology, social adjustments, administration of social work, history of social work, contemporary culture and cultural change, the literature of sociology and regional sociology (a study of the life of the City of Washington).

The first meeting of the year of the university faculties took place Friday evening. Dr. Cloyd Heck Marvin, president of the university, addressed the faculties, and deans of the various schools made announcements. New members of the teaching staff were introduced by President Marvin. The meeting was followed by an informal reception, attended by members of the board of trustees and their wives and members of the faculties and their wives.

President Cloyd Heck Marvin is to be the speaker at the opening exercises of Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Va., tomorrow. His topic will be, "The College and the International Intellectual Cooperation."

The University Hatchet, student weekly, appeared with its opening issue of the year on Saturday. The issue was prepared by the 1929-30 editorial board, including Herbert Angel, chairman; Fern Heninger, Dorothy Albert, Norman H. Conner and Hazel Peterson.

COLLEGE OF MUSIC HAS CROWDED YEAR

Registration Is Largest in History of Washington Institution.

ITALIAN IS ALSO TAUGHT

Opening early this month with the largest registration in its entire history of a quarter of a century, the Washington College of Music announces classes to be formed this week in theory, pedagogy and public school music. Courses in the study of the languages will also commence this week, beginning with classes in Italian—all languages to be under the direction of Harry Baker Humphrey, Ph. D.

The theory department of the college is under the direction of Fanny Amstutz Roberts, with Mrs. Marguerite Carter as instructor in pedagogy. Harmony, counterpoint, composition, fugue and orchestration, as well as classes in the history of music and public school music are now beginning, Dr. Edwin N. C. Barnes being in charge of the music education section.

The texts prepared by Percy Goetschius, for many years a teacher at the Institute of Musical Art, New York City, are used throughout the theory classes, supplemented by studies in orchestration, using the Berlioz and Richard Strauss texts.

The Washington College of Music has been officially recognized by the United States Bureau of Education as an "institution of learning for immigrant students" in accordance with the immigration act of 1924, and the State Department has approved the college for the training of foreign students. In accordance with this arrangement, students may come to the college from foreign countries without being subject to the usual rules concerning the annual quota, and may remain in this country for the period of their study with the college.

The children's department, directed by Catherine Benson, is opening all its classes, and the Toy Symphony and Children's Chorus will shortly be organized for the winter.

Gunston Hall School Will Open Wednesday

The Gunston Hall School will open Wednesday with a large registration. On account of increased enrollment, the school has acquired an adjoining building at 1830 Nineteenth street northwest, where the children's school will be conducted.

Gunston Hall was established 37 years ago. The courses offered are preparatory, academic and collegiate. Fine arts, domestic science and secretarial work also are offered. Athletics and all forms of outdoor exercises are special features of the school and are conducted under trained instructors.

Carusi to Address National Opening

President of University Has Returned From 3-Month Tour in Europe.

Chancellor Charles F. Carusi will address the students of National University at the opening exercises of the sixty-first annual fall term at 6:30 o'clock Saturday evening. He returns during the week from a three months' sojurn on the European continent.

Others members of the faculty, including Associate Justice Frederick L. Siddons, of the Supreme Court of the District, who has been connected with the school for 29 years, will make short addresses.

John L. Cassin, assistant dean of the law school, will celebrate the thirtieth year of his connection with National. For many years he has always been on hand to greet the students, advise them in their work and settle many of the perplexing questions which so often arise under the character of work assigned to him. Besides these services, he is register, and acts as secretary to the board of trustees.

An increasing enrollment is being noted this fall in the number of women students, this being the thirteenth year since the first woman entered the university. Several women's organizations are being fostered by the university. One of the largest organizations in the school is the Cy Pres Club. It is the pioneer woman's society in the school, meeting every Thursday. Election of officers will be held in October.

Mush interest has been displayed in the comparative government and diplomatic history courses. The latter are delivered by Constantine D. Kojouharoff, research professor and professor of diplomatic history in the school of economics and government.

Dean Pergler is giving a new course in comparative government, which includes a study of the new constitutions of Central Europe, and traces how far American models have been followed.

High School Trophies Are Displayed at Store

An interesting collection of trophies awarded to the various high schools and junior high schools throughout the city is on display in one of the Seventh street windows of the Hecht Co. during their annual school week.

The cup in the center front was presented to Central High School for the golf championship from 1925 to 1929 by Charles G. Dawes, Ambassador to Great Britain. The trophies will be on display until Wednesday.

FRANKLIN CLASSES NOW UNDER WAY

Third Evening Freshmen Section Enrollment Is Nearly Filled.

TURNAGE WILL DIRECT

The first section of the freshman class and all advanced classes in the evening division of the Benjamin Franklin University Accountancy School got under way during the past week. The late evening section of the freshman class which began last week was enrolled to its maximum of 60 students before the opening and the 5:25 section scheduled to begin on September 30 is already three-fourths enrolled. As a result of the unusually heavy registration this fall a third evening freshman section has been announced to open Wednesday, October 16. This will be the last freshman class to be organized until February and will meet on Monday, Wednesday and Friday from 7:10 to 8:55.

Accounting instruction in the third section will be in personal charge of Dean Bosworth. J. E. Overlade has been assigned to the class as assistant instructor and will give individual attention to members of the class needing special assistance. Mr. Overlade is a graduate of the Pace courses in Washington with the degrees of bachelor and master of commercial science. Law instruction will be in charge of Needham C. Turnage, United States Commissioner in the District of Columbia and member of the Pace law faculty for the past ten years.

Registrations received for the day section of the freshman class opening October indicate a growing popularity of the morning classes in accountancy. Over one-half of those enrolled in this section are coming to Washington from distant parts of the United States to pursue their accountancy studies. States so far represented are Iowa, Wisconsin, Texas, New Jersey, North Carolina, South Carolina, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, New York, Maryland and Virginia.

GEORGETOWN U. LAW TO HONOR STUDENTS

Formal Program Wednesday for Undergraduate Winners of Last Year.

ADDRESS BY ADKINS

With the reopening of morning classes tomorrow at the Georgetown University School of Law, Dean George E. Hamilton has scheduled a formal academic program for Wednesday afternoon in honor of the new term. A feature of the program will be the presentation of scholastic honors won by undergraduates last year.

The exercises will be conducted in the school auditorium at 5:10 o'clock and will be attended by President W. Coleman Nevils, of Georgetown University, members of the law faculty and approximately 500 students comprising the enrollment in both the morning and afternoon classes. The latter classes started last week.

Jesse C. Adkins, who has been a professor at the law school since 1905, will make the principal address. His subject will be "The Constitution." Owing to the late opening of the morning class, the law school postponed its participation in the recent "Constitution Week" observance until both departments of the school are in operation. Mr. Adkins was chosen as the speaker in this connection. He is a former president of the District of Columbia Bar Association, and at different times in a long public career has held the position of Assistant Attorney General and United States Attorney for the District of Columbia.

A graduate of the Georgetown Law School, Mr. Adkins is one of the oldest members of its faculty in point of service. In recent years he has been lecturer on sales, torts, criminal procedure and practice.

Hamilton to Preside.

Dean Hamilton will preside at the exercises, and the presentation of scholastic honors will be made by the regent of the school, the Rev. Thomas B. Chetwood. President Nevils will make the concluding address.

Georgetown College having reopened last week, the three other departments are preparing now for the resumption of classes. These are the medical and dental schools, which open on Thursday, and the school of foreign service, which does not start its academic year until October 1.

Military activities at the Hilltop got away to a flying start last week under Maj. William H. Hobson, the new commandant of the R. O. T. C. department. Although a newcomer to the present student body, Maj. Hobson is in familiar surroundings, for it was under his direction in 1919 that the first R. O. T. C. unit was organized at Georgetown.

The day after the opening of the academic year at the college, last Thursday, Maj. Hobson and his assistants, Capt. Raymond L. Shoemaker and Lieut. Henry J. Hunt, jr., had enrolled more than 200 cadets in the infantry unit, selected the tentative battalion and company commanders and laid plans for an active year. The battalion will consist of three companies and indications point to the possibility of adding another company in view of the interest being shown by the student body.

With the tentative organization of the cadet battalion, Maj. Hobson immediately took measures to reorganize the R. O. T. C. band, which has been an important factor at all Georgetown athletic contests and the formal military reviews in recent years. At a band rally Thursday afternoon John D. O'Reilly, jr., was elected manager to succeed H. Deane Benson, who was graduated from the college last year. O'Reilly is a Washington boy, the son of Georgetown's nationally known track mentor and physical director. With a strong nucleus left over from last year, the new manager of the band expects to have about 45 or 50 musicians available for the opening of the football season.

Paul Goodwin, of Massachusetts, was selected as the new cadet battalion commander under the tentative organization. He has a splendid C. M. T. C. record and was one of the outstanding cadet officers last year. The battalion adjutant is Carlos A. Fish.

The company officers were announced as follows: A Company, Capt. R. H. Perlitz, commander; First Lieut. U. S. Mulvehill; Second Lieut. S. O. Geiger, First Sergt. T. J. Foley.

B Company, Capt. T. J. McGeary, commander; First Lieut. R. C. Sullivan, Second Lieut. F. P. Broderick, First Sergt. J. H. Mahoney.

C Company, Capt. W. J. McLarney, commander; First Lieut. T. V. Griffin, Second Lieut. C. H. McCormick, First Sergt. D. J. Kisainger.

Pistol Team Planned.

Maj. Hobson is making preparations to organize a pistol team in addition to the rifle team this year. In the last few years the rifle team has had a more or less checkered career and an effort will be made to start training at an early date. It was under Maj. Hobson's former detail at Georgetown that the rifle team won the intercollegiate championship and he is out to duplicate this feat.

Until the recent return of Dr. Edmund A. Walsh from Europe, Dr. William F. Notz, dean of the School of Foreign Service, has borne the brunt of arranging for the new academic year in that department of the university. He entertained a number of distinguished German visitors at his home during the summer. They were officials and educators who were touring the United States studying agricultural, railroad, economic and educational conditions. Among them were Dr. Sterne, a leading banker of Berlin; Prof. Brand and Prof. Areboe, of the University of Berlin. Another visitor was Dr. Sarter, president of the German State Railways.

Will Lecture to Midshipmen.

Dr. Walter E. Jaeger, professor of political science at the Foreign Service School, has just been appointed a lecturer at the United States Naval Academy and will divide his time between that institution and Georgetown. He is a graduate of the Georgetown school and studied for a year at the University of Paris as a Fellow of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Dr. Jaeger will give a series of lectures twice a week at Annapolis on current international economic problems.

Another member of the faculty, Prof. William A. Reid, is still in Central America, where he is making special studies of industrial progress in those countries for the Pan-American Union, of which he is foreign trade advisor. He will return in time for the opening of the school term and will continue his lectures on Latin America as an export field.

Dr. James Brown Scott, professor of international law at Georgetown, is en route to Europe to greet at various ports of embarkation, the delegates to the convention of the Institute of International Law, of which he is the first American president. The convention will be held in New York in October and Dr. Scott will return to this country with the group of European lawyers, diplomats and officials who are coming to attend it.

Dr. Thomas H. Healy, assistant dean of the Foreign Service School, who has been lecturing all summer at The Hague, will return also with the foreign delegation. He is the American president of the convention. It is doubtful whether Dr. Healy will be able to come to Washington before the New York convention opens on October 10.

Parent-Teacher Activities

All material for this column must be in the State Office, Room 101, Burlington Hotel, by Wednesday preceding the Sunday on which publication is desired.

"The Summer Round-up Campaign and the Health of the School Child" was the subject of a talk given over station WOL Tuesday by Dr. Joseph A. Murphy.

Dr. Murphy said in part: "The summer round-up of preschool children inaugurated and conducted by the Parent-Teacher Associations throughout the United States has accomplished untold good to thousands of children every year. This work should be extended to the point where every child throughout the land would have an adequate examination and secure the correction of all remediable physical defects and health habits before school entrance. Such periodical examinations followed up from an early age promote longer life, more efficient citizens freer from mental and physicial defects, and promote the health, happiness and prosperity of the Nation."

Tuesday evening Mrs. R. T. Wyche, State chairman of thrift, will speak on "Thrift in the School." Every Tuesday evening there will be a radio talk under the auspices of the District of Columbia Congress of Parents and Teachers over station WOL from 7 to 7:10 o'clock.

Woodridge.

"The Teacher—A Professional Person" will be the subject of a talk by Miss Anna Halburg, principal of Wilson Normal School, at the opening meeting of Woodridge Parent-Teacher Association to be held at the school on Thursday, October 17, at 2:30 p. m.

The year's program, prepared by Mrs. Lloyd Miller, program chairman, will embrace the seven cardinal objectives of education as outlined by the National Congress of Parents and Teachers. Teachers of the school will carry out this program.

The association is planning to have an intensive drive with a 100 per cent membership of parents and teachers as its goal. A cash prize of $25 will be given the school having the largest increase in membership.

Singing Mothers.

The Singing Mothers will meet in the Burlington Hotel Tuesday at 10:30 a. m.

The envelopes distributed to the members must be returned at this meeting.

Bancroft.

Summer Round-ups.

During September local summer round-up chairmen will receive report blanks which are to be filled out and mailed to the State chairman, Mrs. H. H. Stull, 408 Fourth street northeast, not later than October 23.

It is suggested that the chairmen visit the schools and remind the kindergarten and first grade teachers to ask children for the cards recording their defects corrected.

The infomation on these cards will furnish material for the final reports.

At Public Library.

"Youth in a World of Men," by Marietta Johnson, is a plea for creative learning and personality development. The author stresses the dangers of too much direction and supervision on the part of adults.

"Better Schools," by Carlton Washburne and M. M. Stearns, is written for parents and unspecialized teachers. It presents some of the more outstanding and successful experiments in education.

"The Child-Centered School," by H. O. Rugg and Ann Shumaker, gives a general discussion of the movement which is based on the theory of self-expression. The author's attitude is one of sympathetic criticism.

"Twenty Years Among the 20-Year Olds," by James Hawestells, of campus life and college movements of today.

French Musicians Having Hard Time

Cinema Has Driven Many Out of Work; Rest of Nation Is Working.

Paris, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—There is almost no unemployment in France. The latest statistics of the ministry of labor show only 425 people in receipt of emergency relief.

Through the coming of the talkies, however, it is feared that several hundred musicians now playing in motion picture houses, will be thrown out of work. Notice has been given to the orchestra of one big cinema on the Grand boulevards, while contracts of other orchestras will not be renewed.

The union of cinema musicians is asking younger members to take up other trades. The ministry of labor is refusing all applications of foreign musicians for permission to work in France.

GRADUATE SCHOOL READY FOR STUDY

Registrations at American University for Fall Term Begins Tomorrow.

GREEN CAPS ARE WORN

Registration will open at the graduate school and the school of the political sciences of American University tomorrow morning, following the beginning of the fall term last week at the college of liberal arts of the campus, Massachusetts and Nebraska avenues.

At the downtown schools, 1901-1907 F street, Dr. Lucius C. Clark, chancellor of the university, has assumed charge and is at the office daily in the absence of the new dean, Dr. Walter M. W. Splawn, who is ill in Johns Hopkins University Hospital in Baltimore, but who is expected to recover shortly.

At the college opening exercises Thursday, the principal address was delivered by Senator Fess (Republican), of Ohio. Classes started Thursday afternon, and the enrollment, which has not yet been completed, is expected to be the largest in the history of the school, now five years old.

New Registrar Downtown.

A new registrar has been appointed for the downtown schools and also a new librarian, it was announced by Chancellor Clark. Registrations will take place there during the week, beginning tomorrow, and lectures will start on Tuesday, October 1.

The new registrar is Miss Hazel Feagans, of this city, who received her master's degree from American University. She has taken charge already at the office, 1901 F street. The new librarian for the downtown schools is Miss Dorothy Kirk, of Cattanooga, who received her degree in library science from the University of Illinois. She will be assistant to the new college librarian, Henry G. Statham, whose general office is in the Battelle Memorial Building on the college campus.

Increasing emphasis this year will be placed upon economics, international law and international relations, at the downtown schools, according to Chancellor Clark.

Those who were awarded the two transportation fellowships at the graduate school have arrived and plan to take up their work under the personal direction of Dean Splawn. They are Norris Kenney, of the University of Nebraska, and Leslie A. Bryan, of Syracuse University.

At the college the year's series of vesper services will start this afternoon at the Women's Residence at 5:30 o'clock, with Miss Jane Lytle, chairman of the vespers committee, in charge. She has arranged also for special music.

The green caps which both freshman boys and girls are wearing on the campus are to be the adornment of the first classmen until Christmas, while the green tags, carrying their names and addresses, are to be worn for two weeks. The tags are large, bright green and conspicuous, helping all freshmen to get acquainted with each other and the upper classmen.

Special Freshmen Service.

For the benefit of the freshmen a special chapel exercise was held Friday, when Dean George B. Woods, of the college, made a heart-to-heart talk, telling them what is expected of the class.

The University Glee Club, which made a name for itself in its first season last year, under direction of Dr. Paul Kaufman, will hold its first session of the season this week on a day to be named later to make plans for the season, according to Business Manager Richard Horner. Barrett Fuchs, second tenor; Leon Bryner, first tenor, and J. Harold Riggle, second bass, of the college quartet, are all back in school. A likely candidate for the barytone post, left vacant by Ronald McLaughlin, who did not return, is Robert Fuchs, a brother of the second tenor, who this year comes to American U. from Maryland University, where he was a student last year.

The student council has been called to meet at its first session at luncheon tomorrow by the president, J. Raymond Spaeth. Committees will be appointed and plans will be made to broaden the scope of the council.

At the student party in the gymnasium a play was staged by the committee, headed by Miss Orrel Belle Claflin. Edwin Ross, and including Clyde Williams, Blake Espey, Dorothy Darby and Rosalie Dimmette. Barrett Fuchs sang and dancing followed the program.

Miss Mary Mears Galt and Mrs. Adolf Zucker, of the faculty, will entertain at tea Saturday, September 28, in honor of the new members of the faculty.

Call for Debaters.

The first call for debaters by Coach Arthur S. Flemming resulted in a turnout of twenty upper classmen last week. The freshmen debaters will be organized later.

The faculty committee on social activities has been busy during the opening week of school, the principal function being the reception Friday, when the committee received with Dr. and Mrs. Clark and Dr. and Mrs. George B. Woods. The committee consists of Miss Mary Louise Brown, chairman; Will Hutchins, William B. Holton, Mrs. Marguerite Waite Rand, Charles F. Marsh, and Mrs. Hilda Minder French.

Work Is Called Best Exercise

Duluth Man, 78, Does Balancing Feats to Show He Is Fit.

Special to The Washington Post.

Duluth, Sept. 21.—Plain work, not too hard, or not too easy, is the prime factor in enabling J. R. Quigley to do hand-stands on a chair on his seventy-eighth birthday.

"No, I was no great athlete when I was younger. Used to run a bit, and was a good swimmer, but never indulged greatly in athletics. Work was athletics enough. I didn't have a lot of strength performances either," he says.

"One trick I did, though, up until a few years ago, was a pretty good one. I'd set a half-dozen empty lime barrels, when we were on some job, in a row, and grab 'em one by one with my teeth and throw them over my head. It was rather hard, but there is a trick in it, just as doing a hand-stand on the chair.

"Haven't done any contracting, though for about seven years. I was four years recently estimating the fire losses in the northwoods fires, and I've done some superintending of jobs, the D. and I. R. Office Building at Two Harbors, for instance.

"A man can burn himself out, though, just as through any excess. It doesn't pay to work more than you're built for. Work enough to keep yourself in trim. I got good strength in my arms when I was doing contracting, and I've kept it right along by working.

"Work is the best exercise there is."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Advantages of Cooperation Among Milk Producers, Distributers, and Board of Health in Maryland Shown, With Contrast in New York State—Costs Will Be Greater This Year Owing to Drought, But Increase Will Be Only Slight in Baltimore, Says Writer.

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: In a comprehensive editorial The Post pointedly described the certainty of a higher price for milk this fall and winter. The general drought has burned out the pastures so necessary for the dairymen. Corn production in the United States is 69 per cent of normal and will raise the price of dairy feed. Silage, that money saver to the dairymen, has been cut to less than 40 per cent of normal; hence the dairymen's cost of production has been increased fully 50 per cent. Milk as a food, even if doubled in price, will still be cheaper and far more healthful and nutritious. One quart of milk at 15 cents per quart equals in nutritive values a pound of steak at 60 cents.

The people of New York City are already feeling the effects of the shortage, which will increase as the season advances. The present shortage might have been averted. The everlasting war between the various contending dairy associations subjected the dairymen to the domination of the great milk corporations, such as the Borden, the Sheffield, and other distributing agencies, which took advantage of the hostility between the various organizations such as the Dairymen's League and a number of others.

The attempt of the State to bring about cooperation among the farmers and city consumers by the expenditure of $20,000,000 in the erection of farmers' markets in the cities failed completely after a limited time, during which for a season or more the farmers were united and sold direct to the city distributing stores, cuting out the middlemen, resulting in cutting out about 40 cents on the dollar for distribution and costing the consumer no more but adding to the price received by the producers. This plan in 1915 raised the price of graded apples on the tree to an average of $2.25 and practically stopped the sale of storage eggs as fresh eggs. It developed the largest and best market for State fresh eggs in New York City. Finally left to professional promoters, the farmers saw the plan develop into a partnership between the middlemen and politicians. The farmers became discouraged, until today there are 152,000 less dairy cows in New York State than there were in 1922, with hundreds of abandoned dairy farms and a reduction of production in the best dairy counties of the State.

The domination of the farmers market by the middlemen has produced the continuous complaint of the high cost of living, while tons of the finest food rotted on the farms of the State because farmers could not get returns for them to cover cost of harvesting and transportation charges. The middleman's system has strengthened its control of the markets and increased its charges for distribution. The farm returns seldom exceed 30 cents on the dollar.

In striking contrast I present a picture in which the farmers, united without any State or political assistance, worked out a system of the control of 98 per cent of the Baltimore milk market, where there will be no shortage, only a slight increase in price to cover the cost of increased production.

Twelve years ago Maryland dairymen were about in the same condition as those of New York—a declining industry, many heartbreaking failures and abandoned dairy farms, the men in the business getting but a small share of the consumer's dollar. At the height of the season milk was poured into the gutters of Baltimore. A few strong men who knew the industry undertook to form an association. Finding it difficult to prepare a charter which would meet the legal objections, State and national, they secured the services of Dr. Albert F. Woods, who had come from the headship of the Minnesota Agricultural College. There he had assisted in the formation of the organization which has developed as the greatest butter cooperative organization, which today supplies a large share of the butter consumption to New York, Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia, and yielding the producers more than 85 per cent of the dollar.

Dr. Woods prepared a charter which united the producers, distributors and the board of health. Its motto is "best quality of milk, handled under approved sanitary regulations." In 1919 it produced 7,002,310 gallons, netting the producer $2,466,552.12. In 1928 it produced 27,160,807 gallons, netting the producer $8,462,308.25, an average clear price to the dairymen of 4 per cent milk 31.15 cents per gallon. Its balance sheet on August 31, 1929, shows cash on hand, $276,117; securities, book value, $457,652.37; machinery, equipment, laboratory and by-product plant, $65,347.71; less reserved for depreciation, $17,720; making a total of $820,246.60. Liabilities, $2,721.

The excess of income over expenditures for the fiscal year ended July 1, 1929, is $157,272.68. The cost of distribution to the dairyman is only one-half cent per gallon. It maintains a laboratory where milk is sampled daily. The dairy council operates the year around with movies, stereopticon views and the distribution of literature showing the nutritive end health values of milk as the best and most economical food at a cost of $30,000 per annum, half of which is paid by the distributors. This has increased the consumption of milk in Baltimore by more than 25 per cent; reduced the infant mortality in that city 25 per cent, and has met the constantly increasing production of the association. There are no abandoned dairy farms in that section of Maryland. A higher quality of milk is served than in any other city in the Union at a reasonable price.

Secretary Jardine drafted Dr. Woods, and he is now scientific director of the Department of Agriculture.

Denial Made That Mosby's Men Burned Virginians' Property in War and Statement Made That They Gave No Quarter to Union Forces Found Destroying Property Belonging to Confederates.

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: In an editorial your writer makes the following statement: "Like Mosby's guerrillas, who lived on the enemy and burned barns and haystacks."

That Mosby's men lived on the enemy is true—it was their proud boast that they cost the Confederate government nothing but made Uncle Sam supply them with what they needed—at the risk of their lives. But these men were Southern soldiers and fought in Southern territory (northern Virginia), so it was as ridiculous to accuse them of destroying Confederate property as it would be to say that Grant raided the White House.

The burners of property were the Union troops, notably Sherman in march through Georgia, and Sheridan in his raid down the Valley of Virginia, when he remarked that he had swept it so clean of all food that "a crow flying down the Valley of Virginia now will have to carry his rations." And it was Mosby's men, the Forty-third Battalion, Virginia Cavalry, who were mostly instrumental in stopping such acts. Their leader issued an order that any Union troops caught burning property belonging to Virginians would be given "no quarter," but shot on the spot. Federal forces surprised in the act of burning Glen Welby, the Carter home in Fauquier, were not allowed to surrender, but were shot—except those who fled. This very proper measure put a stop to the burning of homes in Virginia.

German and French War Clemency Contrasted by Writer Who Says French Have Exacted 25 Times More in Reparations Than Germans Did in 1871, Making Withdrawal of Military Pressure by Payments Much Easier Then Than Now.

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: I was much impressed by your leading article on September 18, entitled, "Not As Bismarck Did," though the cause for my reaction lies less in what the author said therein than in what he omitted to say.

He correctly states that the so-called "Iron Chancellor" after the war of 1870 inflicted upon poor France a tribute of $1,000,000,000, but he did not quote against this the figure of Monsieur Poincare's bill against Germany after the recent war, amounting to 132,000,000,000 gold marks or about $42,000,000,000, which is a stupendous difference and one which tends in the very opposite direction of your commentator's desire to show up French clemency against German insistence. And if he reply that the figure mentioned has in the meantime been dropped by the French government in lieu of the Young plan figures, the rejoinder is that Germany has already turned over to the allies—or had taken from her—and paid in cash values of about 60,000,000,000 gold marks to which must be added a present day value of the Young plan annuities of at least 40,000,000,000, making the total indemnity payable by Germany 100,000,000,000 gold marks against 5,000,000,000 francs or 4,000,000,000 gold marks asked by Germany in 1871, i. e., a relation between the two figures of about 1 to 25!

In view of these figures it is very easy to explain why France was able to free herself from military occupation after the war of 1870 within three years, whereas Germany will have to suffer military oppression until June 30, 1930, i. e., for ten and a half years. And even the liberation at that date is, as the history of the last month has shown, not due to French clemency but to the fact that France's allies refused to cooperate further with her in the pursuance of a policy of military pressure.

I shall not discuss the question of territorial conquests and losses, although it is a known fact that Alsace, Lorraine historically belonged to Germany and racially is at least as much German as French; besides that, Germany has in Locarno acknowledged the French conquest. But if your commentator is out to show allied modesty and magnanimity against German "ironhandedness," let me remind him that the allies took away great portions of German territory in the East as well as in the West—in all, about one-fifth of the whole country—and moreover seized all Germany's colonies throughout the world, dividing them up amongst themselves as so-called "mandates," although professing to the world that they were making no territorial conquests at all. Here again I completely fail to see where your historian gets the basis for his judgment: That France and her allies have been more modest, generous and magnanimous in treating Germany after the late war than Germany was toward France under the "Iron Chancellor."

I do not want to be bitter or to raise a controversy on a question which, I suppose, will never be settled to the satisfaction of all concerned, but I strongly feel that the opinion vented by your editorial writer calls for some supplementation, and I have the confidence in the impartiality of your paper that you will give my remarks a suitable space therein.

Unquestioned Optimist, at 60, Tells How It Feels to Be One and How He Came That Way—In Good Health, Never Worries, Father, Working Hard and Likes It.

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: At 60 I am an optimist. Everything is coming my way. My family has been in excellent health, always. Of five children, three have grown to maturity. Physicans' bills have been less than $2 a year each, including birth time.

With an academic training, I have done my own thinking; having high ideals, I have striven to attain them; enjoying a vivid imagination and a lofty ambition, I have attempted to realize them; being "incurably cheerful" and possessed of large hope, my sympathies have been broad enough so that my interest in the present has always been keen. I am not a prophet and do not try to forecast the future; but noting my own experience, the successes and failures of others, I eagerly embrace each day as it comes, and honestly try to get the most possible out of it, for myself and others, too, being altruistic. I do not admit that I was ever so capable as I am now. To whatever I now have, whatever I now am, I expect to add while my faculties remain intact, so that I shall continue to become more capable of performance and of enjoyment as time passes. I have lived to see more real progress than had previously been made during the history of the race. Such rapid strides are now making that I am eager to see still more of what the human hand and mind are able to bring to pass. My one desire is to be useful.

So long as it is possible I shall be glad to live; it is therefore impossible for me to "set a stake" in the calendar. My family has shown a fair longevity. Two were 84, two 86, one 87, one 88 and five were beyond 91, including one at 97. I am in excellent health am working hard and enjoying it, and can now see no place to stop. My step is elastic, my voice is clear, resonant and strong (I addressed an audience of 8,000 recently, quite to their satisfaction), my sight and hearing are still fine, and I easily pass for from 15 to 18 years younger than I am. I never worry. My friends tell me that I am "good for 20 or 25 years," and it is not impossible. I am cheerful, happy, and "live in the sunshine," and would, even though I knew that my hour would strike before "night's candles are burned out."

Rear Admiral Kimball Calls For a Refutation, If It Can Be Made, of His Argument That the Liquor Law Can Not Be Enforced Legally—Eighteenth Amendment and Volstead Act Violated by Treaties.

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: From jurists and statesmen, parsons and politicians, wet spellbinders and dry pulpiteers, antisalooners and profree rummers, publicans and Republicans, Hoovercrats and sinners, all in vain have I sought refutation of, proof of, nor in, or flat contradiction to, the five following statements.

If you, Mr. Editor, would kindly print them, perhaps Senator Borah or Mr. Scott McBride or Mr. Lowman or Dr. Clarence True Wilson or Dr. Doran or Mr. Deets Pickett or Mrs. Willebrandt would kindly refute any or all of the lot.

These are the statements:

1. In 1923 the Supreme Court found that the entry of alcoholic beverages within the jurisdiction of the United States was in nullification of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution and in violation of the Volstead law.

2. In 1924 our Executive negotiated and our Senate confirmed treaties, the highest laws in the land, allowing, protecting and directing the importation of alcoholic beverages within the jurisdiction of the United States.

3. The last administration was forced to choose which prohibition laws it would obey and which prohibition laws it would disobey, and chose to enforce the prohibition treaty laws and thereby to nullify the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution. The present administration has made the same choice.

4. Dr. Doran does and Mrs. Willebrandt did nullify the eighteenth amendment every day.

5. Whether the principle of prohibition be good, bad or indifferent, lawful or lawless, moral or immoral, religious or sacrilegious, Christian or Mohammedan, political, economic or just plain silly and stupid, and putting aside the questions whether the body of prohibition law be a beautiful legalizing of a noble national experiment or merely another nauseating example of the common or garden variety of our American legislative lawlessness; whether or not the attempt at prohibition has increased the volume and profits of the liquor traffic, increased nearly all the old drink evils and created many new and more terrible drink evils; whether or not the attempt at prohibition, through its shining success in suppressing constitutional representation, has succeeded in undermining the Constitution in the way warned against by Washington, and by that means in accomplishing the overthrow of the legislative and executive branches of our Government and establishing in the place of our constitutional government the present unconstitutional de facto dictatorship, under which we joyously carry on the governmental business of what WAS the United States of America—putting somewhat controversial matters aside, there is plainly seen, arising from the reek and murk of all these always shirked questions, one salient clearly defined fact, this: while it is theoretically possible to enforce prohibition illegally, it is absolutely impossible ever to enforce it legally, so long as the present legal conditions obtain under which prohibition laws are and can be enforced, only by nullifying the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution and breaking the Volstead and Jones' laws.

Virginia's Beautiful Scenery, Even of Famous Battlefield, Found Concealed and Marred By Countless Hideous Billboard Signs, 175 Alone Offending the Eye From Mount Jackson to Washington—Like Army of Foreign Invaders.

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: Your editorial, "Historic Spots of Virginia," contained a very interesting paragraph, which reads:

"The historical markers will add much to the attractiveness of Virginia as a tourist State. Tourists can not hunt up old-timers and have history explained to them while passing through the State. Unless such spots are marked on the highways they are usually given little attention."

In another column of the same page I read with great interest the letter from "Sherwood Forest," who comments on the editorial you used from the Columbus Dispatch in regard to sign boards in Virginia.

Just having made a trip into the Shenandoah Valley, I saw a struggle going on that makes me wonder what is going to happen to the markers mentioned above. Nature Magazine, of course, is interested in the fate of these markers.

The battle line can be seen on a trip through the valley, over New Market Gap to Luray and then back to Washington over Thornton Gap by way of Sperryville, Warrenton and Fairfax. I had traveled extensively in the State before the billboard era and had known full well the rare beauty which peeps out from every vantage point on the mountain ranges and in the peaceful valleys. The hills, of which Virginians are rightly proud, are still there along with the spreading meadows and the picturesque village, whose charm is that they are in Virginia.

On every side great 60-foot signs sear the landscape, leaving gaping wounds. They dance up and down the valley pike and the Lee Highway in a delirium of misplaced color. They cut off view after view, while they shriek out the advantage of gasoline, or tell of localities at which to spend the night.

Battle fields, sacred to Southern memory, are not sacred to the invading army of billboard builders. Great glowing gasoline signs stand watch beside the Manassas battle field and blazon out their message close to where the South's heroes lie.

I counted 175 billboards offensive to the sight and fatal to the natural beauty of Virginia from Mount Jackson to Washington, and these do not include the barns repapered with hundreds of small signs, trees coated with slogans and symbols of commercialism or the medley of foreign color within the picturesque villages whose old white-painted houses, sheltered beneath great trees, were almost hidden from view behind great gawky wooden structures. It was as if an army of foreign invaders, dressed in yellow and green and red and blue—any colors that will clash and stand out against the surroundings—had taken possession of the entire region. Most of the signs were being utilized by a few advertisers.

Highways or buyways? The rest of the Nation will be vitally interested in Virginia's answer to the question. At present, the field is won by the advertisers, and unless the citizens make it their fight, too, there can be no question of the final result.

POST MODEL HOME BEDROOMS CHARM

Walls in Soft Gray and Draperies in Brilliant Chintz in Master.

NEW ENGLAND DESIGN

Charming are the bedrooms of the home at 1645 Jonquil street, at Seventeenth street northwest, in Rock Creek Hills, the R. E. Latimer development.

On the second floor is the roomy master bedroom, with private bath. The walls are papered in a soft gray, which forms a wonderful background for the gay chintz draperies. The draperies are of the old-fashioned flower design, with a yellow background, against which are the old-fashioned flowers in their bright reds and greens. On the floor lies a reproduction of an old hooked rug. A typical New England design. The furniture is of the Colonial Empire period. Twin beds of mahogany, beautifully figured, and of the sleigh type which was also a design used during the Empire period. Between the beds is a Duncan Phyfe dropleaf night table, equipped with two drawers which have glass pulls. The bureau and mirror are also of the Empire period, while the dressing table is of late Sheraton.

The fireplace is interesting, and here is found on one side a quaint New England rocker, while on the other side is a splendid small wing chair of American origin. A two-part chaise longue, upholstered in a soft plain linen, completes the room.

Spacious Guest Room.

Across the hall from the master bedroom is found a spacious guest room. The walls are papered in a soft tan-figured paper. The draperies are of plain green taffeta. The rugs are scatter size, and are antique hooked rugs, which have very soft colors of red, tan and green. The furniture is of a beautiful tiger stripe, or curly maple. The whole suite of Cape Cod origin, and depicts a period in America when our own designers equaled those on the other side. A slipper chair is covered in black chintz, with red and green floral design.

This room is of excellent proportions, and is furnished suitably for either a boy's or a girl's room. The walls are papered in a soft gray with floral design of red, green and black. The draperies are a green chintz with a red and green floral pattern. On the floor is a large oval hand-braided rug, which harmonizes beautifully with the wall paper and chintz draperies. The room is furnished entirely with cherry, which is finished in that old early American soft amber tone.

Copy of Old Bed.

A single bed, with quaint spool turnings, a copy of an old bed found in Connecticut, is placed in a panel between two doors. To the left is a Cape Cod bureau, with a splendid hanging mirror. To the right is a two-section open bookcase, a design taken from an old built-in case also found in New England. Near the bookcase is the Foster easy chair, upholstered in a quaint old tapestry. Across the corner is a serpentine front desk, a very rare reproduction, and on this desk is an old oil lamp with parchment shade. A ladder-back chair of Pennsylvania type stands near the desk, with pad cushion to match the draperies. A small book table and atlas, placed before one window, completes this interesting room.

On the third floor, and on the west side of the hall, is another splendid, well-lighted and ventilated guest room. It is indeed quaint with its two dormer windows. The walls are papered in an old-fashioned Colonial paper. Here quaint blue and white percale draperies are used, which are tied well back with holdbacks of the same material. A single four poster bed is used, an extremely fine reproduction of an old bed found in Virginia; a quaint dressing table and chest of drawers. In one dormer is a lovely reproduction of the Boston rocker, with knife-edge cushions of the same material as the draperies. In the other dormer is a slipper chair upholstered in plain blue percale to match the background of the draperies. On the floor scatter size antique hooked rugs have been used, which, together with the draperies, wall paper and the soft tones of the cherry furniture, produce a harmony of delightful restfulness.

Third Floor, East Room.

Across the hall is the east room, another guest room of like design to the west room. The walls are papered in an old Colonial paper, which provides a splendid background for the color scheme of green and white. The draperies are of green and white small-figured percale. On the floor scatter-size antique rugs have been used. There is one dormer window in this room, and in that is placed that quaint old Boston rocker with cushion of the same material as the draperies. A single bed is used, a quaint semiposter type with solid head and foot panels; a fine chest and mirror is placed against one wall, while on the east wall and near a window, is the dressing table, a very interesting piece with its splayed legs, and a rush seat bench for use in front. A slipper chair, upholstered in plain green percale, completes this charming guest room.

All the furniture and rugs used throughout the entire house are exact reproductions of old antique pieces which are owned privately or are now in museums, together with a few pieces which are modern adaptations of old pieces, all carefully executed in the factories of W. & J. Sloane.

REALTY LICENSING BILL IS EXPLAINED

Details Are Constructed With Great Care, Declares John A. Petty.

NOW BEFORE CONGRESS

By JOHN A. PETTY.

Congress has been asked to enact a real estate license law for the District of Columbia. This law, which has been constructed with great care in respect to its details and principles, offers a distinct and helpful service to the people of Washington and a definite measure of protection to legitimate business without any additional tax burden or interference with municipal finance.

New legislation generally is designed to meet an existing or expected need. It is hoped the proposed real estate brokers' license will meet in a rather comprehensive manner a need that exists and reaches a very large section of the citizenry of the Nation's Capital.

To understand the need for this type of legislation it is only necessary to consider the seriousness and importance of real estate practice and the extent to which it affects directly or indirectly every individual in the community. With a realization of this fact and an appreciation of the intricate and technical phases of real estate practice, it is apparent that those who undertake the responsibilities and obligations of rendering real estate service should possess the fundamentals of good character and at least a degree of competency.

Hard Work Necessary.

Yet the false impression that capital, ability and hard work are not necessary prerequisites to success in the vocation of real estate results in many entering this field who would profit more by remaining out. The apparent ease of earning a living in the real estate business without the investment of capital attracts the uninitiated. Visions of quick profits, mistaken ideas of requirements and the simple procedure necessary to embark in the real estate business brings to this field of endeavor many misfits and failures from other walks of life and not infrequently those of questionable reputations.

No business perhaps offers more temptation to slip off the track of honor and straight dealing. In its very nature the real estate business is such that competency and honesty are absolutely necessary to insure the measure of protection the public has a right to expect and to receive.

To the average layman customs and procedure in real estate practice are little known. Many phases in the purchase, sale or renting of real estate are involved and complicated. One seeking or requiring service in such matters frequently is entirely dependent on the advice and guidance of a real estate man in protecting his rights and safeguarding his interests. In addition to acquiring advantages one entering into a real estate transaction almost always assumes definite obligations. Thus the matter is of vital personal importance and the interested party is entitled to at least a reasonable measure of assurance that those who engage to advise and direct him have some accountability for their acts.

Safeguards Are Needed.

When one seeks the services of an attorney at law he realizes the right of that attorney to practice his profession is dependent on his acts, which, if improper, are reviewable by the bar and the courts. Rigid requirements assure competency and skill in the practice of medicine. Because of its intimate relation to the welfare and well-being of the people the practice of real estate should be surrounded by reasonable safeguards.

With the enactment into law of the proposed real estate license measure definite machinery would be created to regulate the issuance of licenses to practice real estate and to supervise the acts of licensees. A commission operating with legal powers would be available to the public and individuals could seek this governmental agency for protection and redress should their experiences justify such help.

Those sponsoring this legislation have framed it with the idea of providing the maximum protection in the field of ordinary real estate brokerage practice and they will be subject to the same limitations, restrictions and supervision that apply to all others who engage in the real estate business.

PROGRESSIVE CITIES SEEK BETTERMENTS

Distinctive Architecture in Homes and Pretty Streets Are Demanded.

MAKE APPEAL TO THE EYE

By ELIZABETH MEACHAM ROBERTSON.

Better community development is a subject which, within recent years, has been widely discussed and differently treated in every progressive city in the United States. The idea of eliminating commonplace, uninteresting houses, and narrow, monotonous streets, placing in their stead houses of distinctive architecture and pretty streets, is an attractive one.

It has made a very definite appeal to all those who take seriously the betterment of their town and community, and has become of equal importance to the individual home owner and the builder of houses, alike.

The time has come when the public, seeing unlimited possibilities in home building, and realizing the shortsightedness which brings about the erection of the ordinary cheap and unlovely house, will no longer accept it.

Nowhere in the United States has the idea of original and beautiful architecture been expressed more feelingly than in Foxhall Village, a development of English houses. These houses have been built with a real desire to do something worthwhile—to make homes that are not only intelligently planned, but are distinctive and unique as well.

The sharp, irregular roof lines command attention, the jutting roofs and bays make each house different from its neighbor. The omission of back yards and their accompanying ugliness has been successfully accomplished in this quaint English village.

In their place grow really beautiful gardens, lending a charm and color to the place which is no small factor in its success. The streets are a direct forge ahead in the line of better community development. They have been carefully planned and laid out, and, completed, wind gracefully through the village, adding immeasurably to its distinction.

Repeatedly groups of houses here have been awarded the class 1 award by the Architects Advisory Council of the District of Columbia, which is the highest rating given by them, and which is to commend the houses to all for being "outstanding among buildings of their type." Foxhall Village has been erected with thought and care, and will remain for years to come an unbeatable argument in favor of better community development.

ROCK CREEK PARK HOME IS COLONIAL

Interior of Lipscomb Mansion Also Is Featured in Period Furniture.

IS OPEN FOR INSPECTION

The colonial home opening today and erected by the William P. Lipscomb Co. for the owners of Rock Creek Park Estates is said to correctly portray every detail of early American architecture. Although fully equipped with modern conveniences, in every other respect it might well grace the country estate of some worthy colonist. A sincere respect for every detail of construction is sensed in the true-to-type appearance of this colonial styled dwelling, and every attempt has been made to recreate the atmosphere of antebellum days.

The interior of the house has been furnished in specially selected period furniture. By special arrangement with the owners the W. & J. Sloane Co. has made a close study of the interior design of the home and has fitted it in a manner truly early American.

According to experts, the interior of the house will exhibit a most unique and interesting furniture arrangement—one that will delight those interested in antebellum interiors. It is said that the architecture of the house lends itself most appropriately to the furnishings that have been selected. In fact, every piece of furniture is distinctly early American or colonial in its design and character, making the decorations of a uniform type that is unusual and striking in a modern home of this kind.

The house will be opened for inspection at 10 a. m. today, complete in every detail. It is suggested for the benefit of those who wish to visit the house today that they drive out Sixteenth street to Kalmia road or take the Sixteenth street bus, which brings them to the entrance of the Estates. Information about the property can be obtained at the company offices at 1603 Kalmia road.

WISCONSIN LICENSE LAW IS OPERATING

Three Realtors Named by Governor to Board Created in New Legislation.

POLICY IS ANNOUNCED

The operation of the new Wisconsin law providing license for real estate salesmen and brokers draws upon Wisconsin real estate men for the guidance and enforcement of State standards applied to real estate practice, through the law's provision requiring that the Wisconsin real estate brokers board of three members, whose duty it is to administer the law, include at least two real estate men.

The new law was enacted early in July. It takes the place of the real estate license law which has been in operation in Wisconsin since January 1, 1920.

Upon enactment of the law Gov. Kohler immediately apointed the following three realtors to the board: Elmer H. Grootemaat, Milwaukee, president; W. E. Webster, Hudson, vice president, and Alex T. Uehling, Madison, treasurer. The appointments were unanimously confirmed by the Senate.

The first official action of the newly appointed board has been to issue a statement of policy in which it adopts the code of ethics of the National Association of Real Estate Boards as the governing principles for real estate practice in Wisconsin. The statement of policy makes the following specific provision: "The code of ethics of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, which has been adopted by State and local boards throughout the country, is regarded as the standard of conduct by real estate men throughout the United States. In questions of conduct . . . this code of ethics may be used as a guide."

Written and Oral Examination.

The Wisconsin board statement of policy interprets the competency test provided for in the new law to mean both written and oral examination of each individual applicant for license as broker or salesman, and announces that it will act upon this interpretation. The statement further announces that "The use of 'free lot' schemes will be deemed evidence of untrustworthiness."

In closing its statement of policy the Wisconsin board makes the following suggestions to the public for self-protection in real estate investments:

"In order to reduce the difficulties between brokers and their clients to a minimum, this board makes the following suggestions to the public:

"First. No person should deal with a real estate agent for the purpose of selling, buying or renting property unless he is certain that such broker or salesman has been licensed by the Wisconsin Real Estate Brokers' Board.

"Second. Persons dealing with a broker should be satisfied that such broker or salesman is financially and morally responsible in order to carry out the terms of his agreements.

Papers Should Be Read.

"Third. Do not sign any papers or agreements without first reading the same and understanding all of its provisions.

"Fourth. Insist upon receiving a copy of all agreements and papers which are signed by you.

"Fifth. This board is available to receive and investigate complaints of misconduct against real estate brokers and salesmen; it is not a collection agency, but is here to serve the public and the real estate profession. It is the board's duty to eliminate as far as possible misconduct upon the part of brokers and salesmen. When any broker or salesman has been guilty of misconduct, the matter should be reported promptly to the Wisconsin Real Estate Brokers' Board."

The Ohio State board of examiners, when the Ohio license law was put into operation, in 1927, adopted the code of ethics of the national association as the basis of the examination required to establish familiarity with real estate business ethics on the part of an applicant for real estate brokers' or salesman's license.

Psychology Valued In Wall Street

Preferred to Mathematics and Economics in Guess on Stocks.

New York, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Psychology has displaced mathematics and economics as the best asset for successful security trading.

Mathematics and economics retain a large degree of importance. Earnings, a company's position in a given industry, and the position of that industry in the general economic structure, are factors which must be considered in judging the value of a security.

But with many popular stocks selling from 25 to 30 times their earnings, and the best economists of the country disagreed on whether the future will justify such prices, successful trading in the most active issues has come to be little more than successful guessing on popular or professional reactions to current developments.

Research Finds Business Is Good

Future of Washington Is Sound, Petty Tells Conference.

Five weeks' informal research just completed by John A. Petty, executive secretary of the Washington Real Estate Board, shows the business future of Washington to be sound he informed a luncheon conference of the sales managers' section of the board's division at the Hamilton Hotel last week.

The investigation, Mr. Petty revealed at this first meeting of the section for the administrative year, indicated a healthy upward trend of business conditions and that an area of good business was not a month or year away, but here at the moment. While his information was in certain instances confidential, he indicated that normal conditions had prevailed through the slack months and were steadily improving.

He praised the cooperation of the press with the real estate profession and reviewed progress of the campaign for a real estate license law for the District which has been introduced in the Senate.

A. E. Bietzell, sales manager of the Cafritz organization, presided at the meeting and Benjamin T. Webster, Boss & Phelps, president of the board, was a guest.

Rust Is Proved Healthful Ration

May Damage Machinery of the Farmer, but Adds Pounds to Cattle.

Ames, Iowa, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Common iron rust, that has damaged the Iowa farmer's machinery, may pay him back by adding pounds to his cattle.

Eperiments at Iowa State College show that iron oxide, scientific name for rust, added to cattle ration, is beneficial.

For eight months groups of cattle were fed different rations, and of the lot, the group which ate common rust made the best showing. Their ration included a mixture of 98 per cent of bone meal, limestone and potassium iodide, and 2 per cent iron rust. For eight months each steer received an ounce of iron rust a day.

The average gain was 2.62 pounds per head a day, almost one-third more than a lot fed a ration similar except that the iron rust was omitted.

The cost of the gain was less for the "rust" group by 30 cents per hundredweight, according to John M. Evvard, college feeding epert.

Plans were announced last week for the building of an addition to Alban Towers that will make this apartment house one of the three largest in Washington. Baer & Scholz, owners and builders of Alban Towers, reported yesterday the purchase of the northwest corner of Wisconsin avenue and Garfield street, adjoining Alban Towers on the south, from the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral Foundation. These negotiations were handled by the firm of J. A. McKeever Co.

It is expected that ground will be broken for the new addition to Alban Towers this week, as the plans have already been approved by the District building inspector's office.

This new building when completed will have a total of 775 rooms, divided in 205 apartments, ranging in size from three rooms and bath to six rooms and two baths, with about 90 per cent of the apartments having porches.

The present Alban Towers Building was designed and built by Baer & Scholz about one year ago. The demand for apartments in this location, one of the highest in the District and overlooking the city proper, was so great that the owners purchased the adjoining property for the new addition.

The complete property covers the entire block on Wisconsin avenue from Massachusetts avenue to Garfield street, a distance of 300 feet, with a frontage of 221 feet on Massachusetts avenue. The entire building will have a cubical content of 3,200,000 cubic feet.

Reservations are already being made in the new addition, with the four-room and two-bath apartments proving very popular. Automatic coal stokers, gas refrigerators, maid's retiring rooms on each floor and garage space for tenants' cars are some of the new features the owners have incorporated in this building.

Ranger Flees Girls To Capture Wildcat

Yosemite Wild Animal Easier to Quell Than Angry Women.

Special to The Washington Post.

Yosemite, Sept. 21.—Ranger F. S. Garl found himself in an embarrassing situation when called upon to decide between two irate young women or catch a wildcat barehanded. He chose the latter.

While patroling the Wawona road near Alder Creek, Ranger Garl saw a half-grown wildcat run across the road. He stopped his car, grabbed a sack and started in pursuit. The animal ran up a tree, with the pursuer close behind. In the meanwhile another car approached occupied by the two young women. In his haste, Ranger Garl had left his car near the middle of the road so the other car was unable to pass. The girls commenced tooting their horn and shouting angrily at the ranger.

Holding the squirming, clawing cat in one hand, Garl managed to effect a compromise with the two young women, who helped him place the wildcat in a sack. He then drove his car to one side, allowing the girls to pass. The cat was sent to the local zoo, while Ranger Garl is still trying to decide which was the easiest—catching the wildcat or trying to argue with the young women.

Most Gullible Man Is Believed Found

Police Captain Is Floored When Sheriff Refuses to Doubt Suspect.

Special to The Washington Post.

Kansas City, Mo., Sept. 21.—Capt. B. H. Thurman, superintendent of the motor theft bureau at police headquarters, claims to have discovered the world's most gullible man.

For several days Thurman has been trying to find a man who is alleged to have stolen a motor car here. The man operates a paddle wheel with a carnival company, blankets being the prizes offered to the holder of lucky numbers.

He wired the man's description to the sheriff in a small town in Nebraska, telling him the man would be there on a certain day and requesting information concerning him. him.

Today the sheriff called Capt. Thurman by telephone and made a report.

"You are wrong about that man," the sheriff told the police official. "I know crooks when I see them, for I have had a great deal of experience catching them. I went down to where this man was operating his wheel and told him I had heard he was crooked and that he was cheating the people. I decided to try out his wheel. I put a dime on a number and got a paddle. The wheel stopped on my number and I got the best blanket in the stand. How can such a man as that be dishonest?"

Capt. Thurman still is convinced the carnival man stole a motor car, but is at a loss as to how he will find some one in the small town who will agree with him.

Weddings Fewer In Constantinople

Census Shows 400,000 Unwed Maids and Bachelors and 100,000 Widows.

Constantinople, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—A champion ringer of marriage bells in the days of polygamy, Constantinople now celebrates fewer weddings, annually, than any of the great cities of the world.

Out of a population of 700,000 adults, only two-sevenths are married, according to statistics gathered by a Belgian expert, M. Jacquart, who has been conducting the first reliable census ever taken in Turkey. Four hundred thousand bachelors and bachelor girls and 100,000 widows, widowers and divorced persons who have not remarried, form five-sevenths of the adult population.

In the first three months of 1928 marriages in the city totaled 1,050. In the same period this year the number dropped to 795. The severe economic crisis which Turkey is traversing is a factor of the amazingly widespread celibacy. Taxes are going higher every year, and the cost of necessities every month. Proportionately down goes the ability of the average man to support anybody but himself.

StandardSchooling Decided in Mexico

Individuality Is Preferred, Undersecretary of Education Says.

Mexico City, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Education should develop individuality rather than standardize thought and habits, Moises Saenz, undersecretary of public instruction, told state directors of education who met here.

"Education is parallel to life itself," he said. "It should teach us to master our character, to give greater expression to our personality. There is a marked difference of character among the people of Mexico and standardization represents for us a danger, whereas by encouraging diversity in community life we can be ourselves."

He emphasized that an era of construction has come upon Mexico and that the time has arrived "to bring order out of confusion."

WestIndies Negroes Outnumber Whites

Ratio of 10 to 7 Reported, Except in Cuba and Porto Rico.

Kingston, Jamaica, Sept. 21 (A.P.). The population of the West Indies has recently been estimated as slightly more than 10,000,000, of which probably 7,000,000 are blacks or mulattos. Whites predominate in Cuba and Porto Rico, but in all the other islands the colored races outnumber the whites.

Some curious facts came to light concerning the origin of the natives of the Caribbeans. The native colored citizen of Bermuda, for example, is partly descended from the American Indian, 800 of whom were banished to the island during the early Indian wars in New England. In some of the islands are thousands of Hindus imported as coolie labor.

Among the millions of original Caribs populating the West Indies only a few hundred remain, the Spaniards having destroyed them. African slaves were brought to the islands to take the places of the aborigines.

MODERNE!

STARTLING . . . bizarre, perhaps . . . but certainly unique and interesting as well . . . today's modern note in interiors, as disclosed in the newly designed, decorated and furnished model apartment home at Tilden Gardens.

Expressive of the new age, this creation is a revelation of the stark simplicity, the daring innovations in color and form, the harmony of line and tone that can be achieved with an intelligent interpretation of the new motif in interior decoration . . . radically different, but utterly intriguing.

Description would be futile . . . only by inspection can it be appreciated. Moderns will be charmed. And even those of more conservative tastes will be interested in seeing this unusual home. Afterward . . . or before . . . they will be quite delighted with the other model home, furnished in the Colonial style, conventional and restrained.

Both Model Homes have been decorated and furnished through courtesy of W. B. Moses & Sons. Both are open for inspection every day until 9 p. m.

BEAUTY OF MODERN INTERIOR IS SHOWN

Effective Demonstration Is Made in Exhibit Rooms in Tilden Gardens.

HARMONY IS ACHIEVED

An excellent demonstration of an effective and interesting modern interior is found in one of the two exhibit apartment homes in the new club building at Tilden Gardens, cooperative apartment development of M. & R. B. Warren, at Connecticut avenue and Tilden street. With an ideal background, harmonious in every respect, W. B. Moses & Sons have furnished and decorated it throughout in the modern manner.

From the archways, fireplace, wall coverings, through the floor coverings, draperies, furniture, down to the andirons, bookracks and ashtrays, the modern note is expressed completely in the best of taste.

In every age man has attempted to give expression in physical form to the prevailing spirit of his time. In music, paintings, architecture, dress and otherwise, artists have visualized in tangible things something of the prevailing thought and characteristics of their contemporary life.

The motif associated with today's customs, habits, thoughts, mode of living, is usually expressed by what, for want of a better term, we speak of as modernism. It is used to embrace jazz, futuristic art, advanced architecture as represented by towering set-back structures of our metropolitan cities, ultra feminine dress styles, and other manifestations (or is merely by-products?) of our swift moving age.

In the "Gay Nineties."

Interior decorations and furnishings, too, have reflected various eras. A definite picture is brought to our minds in alluding to interiors in the colonial or Victorian, "gay nineties" or "Grand Rapids" styles.

In interior decoration modernism has expressed itself in bizarre design, with angles replacing curves, by daring innovations in color and form, striking and startling contrasts and combinations. Odd textures replace the more conventional and accepted ones for floor and wall coverings, draperies and upholstery fabrics.

Interpretation of the new motif calls for originality and daring, combined with excellent taste, good judgment and a high degree of intelligence, that the effect desired may be achieved without sacrifice of harmony of line, without clashing of colors or, in fact, without any sacrifice of the principles of good taste, as well as comfortable living.

Unique Result Achieved.

The picture on this page gives some idea of the unique result that has been achieved in the modernistic exhibit apartment home in Tilden Gardens, but no photographs could adequately show the striking effect, the complete harmony of line and color that has been secured. This can really only be appreciated by a personal inspection.

Those of modern tastes will undoubtedly be completely charmed by the intriguing and novel effects obtained. And even those of more conservative tastes will be interested to see how attractive and comfortable such a home can be made. They will be forcibly struck by the contrast between this and the other model furnished home, done in the colonial style, with a far more conventional and restrained treatment.

Whether or not one's tastes are inclined toward the modernistic in interior design and decoration, it is safe to predict that this new feature (the modern exhibit apartment) at Tilden Gardens will arouse much comment and debate.

DRIVE FOR MORALS STARTED IN PARIS

Prefect of French Capital Is Striving to End City's Wickedness.

BAD THEATERS CLOSED

Paris, Sept. 21 (A.P.). — "Wicked Paris" is in the throes of a tremendous drive toward morality.

Two plays have been ruled off the boards within a week by Jean Chiappe, prefect of police, in his capacity as guardian of public order and morals.

In the memory of man it is the first time that a Paris theater has been compelled to take a play off its repertoire on moral grounds. Yet not a sound was heard about that overworked word "liberty" being suppressed.

Another decree issued by M. Chiappe the same week also passed almost without comment by the French press, although it is likely completely to alter the aspects of the far-famed Paris boulevards within the year.

Spinning Wheels Banned.

Spinning wheels visable in all the innumerable fairs of the city, where through risking the modest sum of fifty centimes—two cents—one may win two pounds of sugar, a doll or a few cigars must go from the boulevards. Forbidden also are the fortune tellers, palmists and other mechanical contrivances which give answers to queries concerning the character, destiny and appearance of the lady who is to share the life of the seeker after information.

Prefect Chiappe, the most energetic police official Paris has had in many years, has soured on the reputation of wickedness which the city has attained throughout the world and has set his heart on making the French capital a moral place.

So recently, when "Les Desaxes de Paris"—which might be translated broadly as "The Decadents of Paris"—appeared at the Theater Renaissance, M. Chiappe's private censor reported that the play gave a most realistic picture of the haunts and diversions of certain immoral persons, and that no artistic feature about it redemmed the all-too-vivid realism.

Theater Is Closed.

Then the prefect personally attended the show, and "shocking!" he is quoted as having said, speaking the word without that touch of ill-suppressed admiration used by tourists who study the various presentations of such psychological problem. The next evening the theater was dark.

Undaunted, the management, after a few days, put on another play called "Passions." It was merely a revision of the former play with a few objectionable scenes altered. M. Chiappe stepped in and closed the theater after three performances.

Paris newspapers generally have approved M. Chiappe's policy. They don't want too rigid a censorship in the freest and gayest city in the world, but, some admitted, there should be a limit somewhere.

Government "Tip" Used by Farmers

Michigan Potato Growers Have Lost Heavily by Ignoring Advice.

Grand Rapids, Mich., Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Michigan farmers who lost heavily by storing their 1928 potato crop are following the Government's tips on the best time to market their tubers this year.

Federal observation over a period of 27 years indicate that it rarely pays to hold potatoes in years when the national production exceeds a per capita of 3.8 bushels. The trend in prices usually is upward when national production falls below 3.2 bushels per capita.

Michigan farmers stored about 75 per cent of their crop last fall despite a per capita production in excess of four bushels, and they have taken heavy losses.

8-Story Houses on 110-Foot Wide Streets Urged on Board.

Request for a hearing on an amendment to the zoning regulations permitting erection of eight-story buildings on 110 foot streets has been submitted to the District Zoning Commission by the Operative Builders Association of the District of Columbia and Washington Chapter, American Institute of Architects.

The amendment carries the proviso that above the fifth story there shall be a set-back of six inches for each foot increase in height and there is an additional provision that the total cubic content of the building shall not exceed by more than 20 per cent the maximum cubic content allowed under present regulations in a five-story building.

Adoption of such a change would permit improvement in appearance of buildings within the confines concerned and terraced apartments.

STANDARDS FOUND FOR CONSTRUCTION

New York Building Congress Issues Specifications in Structural Work.

ARRANGED IN TWO PARTS

After several years of preparation the New York Building Congress has issued its Standard Specifications covering all structural work except the mechanical trades, concerning which specifications are now being shaped.

The Standard Specifications are composed of two parts, Part A and Part B, which are explained by Thomas E. Snook in The Octagon, journal of the American Institute of Architects.

"Part B," Mr. Snook says, "consists of clauses governing the quality of materials and workmanship, and is the printed standard form now issued.

Made Part of Division.

"Part A is to be written by the architect and is to be a list of the materials to be used, to which is added the numbers of such clauses in Part B governing the quality and workmanship of these various materials.

"At the head of each division of work in Part B special note is made that the General Conditions of the Contract of the American Institute of Architects, current edition, shall form a part of that division.

"This is a splendid work of the New York Building Congress and has already been used with great success for some large operations in the metropolitan district and in the South, and undoubtedly can be used to a very large extent by architects throughout the country.

"Printed editions of these specifications can be obtained from the New York Building Congress, and may be bound up with the General Conditions of the Contract of the American Institute of Architects, or architects who prefer to typewrite their specifications can still obtain many of the advantages of the standard specifications by copying the clauses verbatim—giving proper acknowledgement that the clauses so used are copied verbatim from the New York Building Congress Standard Specifications—Part B.

Work Was Laborious.

"The clauses in Part B are the result of laborious work on the part of a special committee of the New York Building Congress, which has taken up each division separately with preclauses were indorsed by the various branches of work. And finally, these clauses were indorsed by the various trade associations or by recognized experts where there is no trade association. Architects of wide experience believe that they represent the very best up-to-date practice.

"There is also a psychology in producing specifications in which the materials and workmanship are standardized, as the contractors estimating on work soon familiarize themselves with the requirements of these standards, and a plane of confidence between architect and contractor is firmly established."

REOPENING OF MILL PUTS LIFE IN TOWN

3,000 Rejoice as Salmon Falls, N. H., Plant Starts After Three Years.

POVERTY SEEN LIFTED

Special to The Washington Post.

Salmon Falls, N. H., Sept. 21.—This town died three years ago. Recently it celebrated its resurrection with one of the biggest community parties in the history of this part of the country. Three thousand persons, it was estimated, came to town to participate in a festival which centered around a 1919 edition of the old red mill.

The mill, which for many years provided employment for 500 persons out of the town's total population of less than 2,000, went on the rocks in the early winter of 1926. The effect on the townspeople was devastating. The sale and subsequent shutting down of the plant cut off practically the only income they had.

The years since 1926 have been exceedingly lean years for the mill workers who have stuck it out here. Poverty bites hard in mill towns in periods of unemployment. Bills run up, storekeepers in turn incur debts, rents aren't paid, money is drawn from banks, and a certain number of persons, as was said and proved in Salmon Falls, go into bootlegging and get arrested.

New Spirit Exists.

The celebration marked the end of all that for at least a long time to come. There is more hope and good cheer than any one in the town has felt for a long time. It is a bit difficult for an outsider to realize how completely this big brick mill, standing stark and idle, has dominated the thoughts of the people who live in its shadow. Priests and ministers in their pulpits have been praying for years that the wheels might turn once again.

All the prayers and wishes of the past year have now been answered in full measure. As a result Salmon Falls bids fair to become perhaps the first industrially rejuvenated town of New England. This town's problem has been that of a hundred others, and its good fortune in solving it is regarded by many as an omen of what other unadjusted towns may hope for.

One of the most significant features of the occasion is the new spirit which exists between the mill executives and the townspeople. The new company is the Tire Fabric Corporation whose business is the manufacture of the cotton stuff which goes into rubber automobile tires. The company officers are New Bedford men, for the most part.

The exemplar of this new spirit is Andrew G. Pierce 3d, of New Bedford, son of the Andrew G. Pierce, who is president of the American Woolen Co.

This Pierce is just 21. He attended St. Mark's School and Berkshire School, until three years ago. He might, of course, have gone to college and had a fine time. Instead, when he was eighteen he went into a textile mill and worked for a year. He knows the drudgery that mill work is, and he isn't yet old enough to be hardboiled about it.

He is treasurer of this new company. He came down here a few months ago, took a room in South Berwick, just across the river, and he has been working early and late ever since. He is putting into effect certain decencies which were strangely lacking under the former mill regime.

There are about 30 mill tenement houses in the town, capable altogether of sheltering perhaps 150 persons. They had been standing for years, and in some of them conditions had become unspeakable. Young Pierce, soon after his arrival, went into one and found its kitchen occupied in part by a cat, dead, and a goat, equally dead.

Orders General Clean-Up.

He forthwith decreed spring cleaning on a big scale. Every house on the list has been or is being repaired, inside and out. New wall paper is being put on, bathrooms are being installed, heating plants are being fixed and the dirty look of the village has been replaced by a cheerful, blue-and-white color scheme.

He showed a reporter through a big twenty-room house of ancient vintage, which has been renovated. It is to be a boarding house for men. Rooms are to cost about $2 a week per man. It is the intention to charge just enough rent to pay the light and water bills, with a little left over to cover repairs and upkeep. The company intends to make no profits from rents.

This particular house has been painted inside and out. Rooms are freshly papered in bright colors. The beds looked comfortable and the bed linen was crisp and spotless. Shower baths will probably be put into the basement. In the old days the mill boarding houses were not like that.

Before the shutdown the mill employed about 500 men and women. At present the mill is running to capacity days and using 250 employes. Within a month, Pierce said, it will be using 500 persons and running 24 hours a day, with three eight-hour shifts. Wages, he said, are based upon the scales paid in Fall River and New Bedford. In operation since March 12, he said, the mill already shows a profit and has its output bought for the next three years.

"BROKER" PLAYS WRONG MARKET

TIP IS FOUND IN WALLET

Chicago, Sept. 21.—Anthony Betek, middle-aged and reputed to be wealthy, was enjoying his evening repose on the front porch of 2029 Grenshaw street after a strenuous day at his wholesale meat market. He was pondering the chance for immediate profit in a recently acquired parcel of real estate when the telephone tinkled.

"Mr. Stewart speaking," an agreeable voice announced. "I represent a Springfield syndicate. You have some real estate on the northwest side?"

Next day Mr. Batek met Mr Stewart and found him no less pleasant than his voice. Mr. Stewart's syndicate, it seemed, was seeking to promote an airport and would pay handsomely for an option on the Batek property.

Enter a Black Wallet.

That night the pair left for Springfield. Next morning, en route from a Springfield station to a hotel, Mr. Stewart's toe sent a fat black wallet skidding ahead on the sidewalk.

"Ha! $80 in here," chuckled Mr. Stewart, who reached first. "And the owner's name inside—a Mr. Mason, of the St. Nicholas Hotel. I ought to return it to him, huh?"

Mr. Mason was overjoyed to have his wallet restored. Not on account of $80, but there were some precious numbers on calling cards in the wallet.

"Tips on the stock market—I'm a trader in Wall street," Mr. Mason explained. "I ought to do something for you boys and, by gosh, will. Wait!"

He's an Amiable Fellow.

Mr. Mason hurried away, but was back in half an hour, beaming.

"Boys, you're rich. I played a tip on the market and the stock jumped. My broker will be here with my winnings in a little while. Think of it—$150,000. And you're both in on it."

In came the broker—a Mr. Alton, and he had a brief case stuffed with currency.

"Divvy up!" directed Mr. Stewart.

"But your margins, gentlemen. Suppose the stock had fallen, instead of rising," said the broker.

Messrs. Stewart and Mason each produced a packet of notes bound with a tape, marked $20,000. Mr. Batek hemmed uncomfortably and finally agreed to go home and get $20,000.

"But how did you catch on?" inquired Lieut. John O'Brien, after Mr. Batek picked up the photographs of his three acquaintances out of the rogues' gallery at the bureau of identification last night.

"That wallet on the sidewalk," explained Mr. Batek, "He said he was a Wall street broker, but the address in gold letters was the St. Nicholas Hotel, Springfield."

School for Police In Need of Dean

Special to The Washington Post.

Kansas City, Mo., Sept. 21.—A college for policemen, at which will be taught the scientific application of modern methods for the detection and prevention of crime, is the newest plan of John L. Miles, chief of police, to raise the Kansas City Police Department to a level with other well-conducted businesses.

He announced that he is seeking a man with the necessary academic training to qualify him as the dean of the proposed educational institution.

Applicants for the position of college head must meet rigid requirements, according to Chief Miles. They not only must have a working knowledge of many of the sciences, but will be required to be born leaders and perfect specimens physically.

The strict requirements are necessary, as Chief Miles' college course would include courses in law, presentation of cases in court, criminology, athletics and psychology.

In the opinion of Chief Miles the last named science is absolutely essential to the success of a patrolman, as it will enable the graduates to differentiate between a man with a safe blower's urge and one with a house prowler's complex.

Kansas City's Police Department is antiquated, Chief Miles said. While criminals have taken advantage of the modern sciences to help them in their lawless work, the average municipal law enforcement body is continuing to use the same principles of crime detection and prevention that were in use in a less sophisticated age.

Rugged Picturesqueness Consistently Preserved

Marks the Development of

Wesley Heights

Twice Consecutively Awarded the Washington Board of Trade's Diploma of Highest Honors

In marked contrast to speculative promotion, Wesley Heights is built into nature and not nature revised to conventionality.

It is the preservation of its rugged beauties that makes possible its incomparable charms of landscape and architecture.

No tree is ever sacrificed to construction in Wesley Heights. Artistic advantage is taken of the rolling ground which mounts to hilltops and slopes into nestling valleys—with every home designed for and fitting into its selected environment.

Miller-built insures not only homes of super-construction but of superior planning and equipment; and with Miller-control goes the assurance that what Wesley Heights is today—Washington's most sensibly exclusive community—it will continue to be for all time.

Children Direct Great Museum

Eight Boys and Girls Are in Charge of Indianapolis Institution.

Indianapolis, Sept. 21. — Picture eight children, 10 or 11 years old, seated around a gigantic directors' table pondering the best way to interest juveniles and seniors in a 20,000-exhibit museum.

That's how the children's museum here in conducted, six boys and six girls comprising the board of directors.

This board offers child thoughts for child consumption and turns its recommendations over to a senior board for final consideration.

Mrs. John N. Carey, a world traveler, founded the museum in 1926 and gave it use of her 36-room mansion. Members of the children's board of directors are chosen from public schools.

One of the outstanding exhibits is the quaint old automobile built in 1891 by Charles Black, an Indianapolis carriage maker. Sponsors of the exhibit claim it was being operated in city streets here three years before Haynes invented his car.

Early American Home Built by Wm. P. Lipscomb Co. for the Owners of the Estates

Famous Early Americans Chose This Type of Home

NOTHING so well embraces the principles of true American architecture as the Colonial type of home. It was the first individual expression of American home building art—it still remains first in the hearts of many modern home owners. Distinquished early Americans chose this comfortable form of dwelling to add beauty and character to their spacious country estates. True to the traditions of its noble ancestors is the Colonial home shown above. Its distinguished lines suggest stately dames in powdered coiffures and gallant gentlemen in silken hose. Peaceful scenes of domestic contentment are pictured on its broad verandas and wide, hospitable entrances. . . . And to give further expression to the noble principles embodied in its stately architecture, this charming home fronting Rock Creek Park looks out over the historic, rolling hills of

For the Lover of Colonial Beauty

Lovers of the antique and those who are interested in early American interiors will enjoy a real treat in browsing among the quaint rooms and corridors of this true-to-type early American home. Furniture and adornments blend entirely with their setting—adding an atmosphere of romantic charm felt only in the oldest remaining examples of Colonial architecture. After special study—and by special arrangement with the owners—W. and J. Sloane have selected and fitted the home with the most representative examples of early American furniture that their trained experts and elegantly equipped salons could provide.

Once In Stately Stage Coaches . . . Now in Modern Motor Cars

When you drive out to inspect this early American home—today maybe—it is interesting to note the changes that time has made in Estate ownership. Dirt roads and slow, stately stage coaches have been supplanted by smooth surfaced thoroughfares and swift moving motor cars. Estate owners now enjoy every modern convenience and comfort—yet the homes in Rock Creek Park Estates bear a marked resemblance to the Colonial mansions of early America in point of seclusion, quiet and natural beauty. When you visit this newly erected, early American home, you can picture yourself back in Ante Bellum days and forget that modern conditions have almost erased this charming form of country life which the creation of Rock Creek Park Estates has again made possible. 2 MEN IN FAMILY 50 YEARS IN FIRM

Southbridge, Mass., Workers Make Unusual Record in Employment.

DAILY AT THEIR TASKS

Southbridge, Mass., Sept. 21.—Eli Delage has just completed 50 years' service with the American Optical Co. and is the second brother in this family to work for more than half a century for this firm. His elder brother, Louis K. Delage, leader of the Southbridge Brass Band, preceded Eli by four years. Both brothers are found daily at their tasks.

Three other brothers are also veteran workers with this company. Frank Delage has rounded out 47 years; Joel is now in his forty-third year, and Paul Delage has passed his fortieth year, making a total of 234 years, what is believed a world's record.

Louis K. was only 9 when he started to work. The Delage brothers are all United States citizens, and Eli is father of Tax Collector Leon J. Delage.

The family has done considerable in the way of developing real estate in Southbridge, and the five brothers are all married and have large families. In the days these brothers started to work the entire spectacle or eyeglass was made throughout by one man, but in later years this system was abolished, and today each worker is assigned one special task.

YOUTH IN CONTROL OF SENECA INDIANS

Bull Moose Party Victorious Over Old Progressives at Election.

FOLLOW WHITES' WAYS

Special to The Washington Post.

Batavia, N. Y., Sept. 21.—The younger men control today the affairs of the Seneca Indians on the Tonawanda Reservation, about 20 miles northwest of here. Of the two tickets placed in the field one was known as the Bull Moose party in an election that drew less than 100 voters to the polls, and the other faction was known as the Progressive and People's ticket.

The Bull Moosers swept their ticket to the front and won the election by about 15 votes. The result of the election was a surprise to many of the Indians.

The new officeholders are all young men whose ideas of administration are expected to follow more closely the ideas of the white man. For a generation past the Progressive party has been in power, and the defeat of that old party by the Bull Moose party has the majority of the Indians guessing and talking.

While the duties of the offices to be filled by those elected are few, still the offices are considered influential positions. The Indian officials have no public funds to spend and have no part in the preparations for the various feast days and celebrations held throughout the year, as these matters function under the religious organization, but there was no religion involved in the election. There is usually a fight between the pagan and Christian Indians on the reservation. This year all parties included Christians and the religious issue was not brought in.

The following officers were elected: President of the reservation, Howard Pierce; secretary, Aaron Poodry; treasurer, Harrison Poodry. The following "peacemakers" were elected: Edward Poodry, Norman S. Parker and Lyman Johnson. Russell Hill was elected marshal.

Meetings of the new officers will be held in the Indian Council House on the lower end of the reservation. When any important questions arise regarding the welfare of the nation in its relations with the United States Government or with other Indian nations, the entire council is called together to talk over the matter and take action.

AT THE CHESS TABLE

By WILLARD H. MUTCHLER.

The conclusion of the first series of eight games of the world titular match at Wiesbaden found Dr. Alexandre Alekhine successfully defending his title against the onslaughts of E. D. Bogoljubow and leading with a score of 4 victories, 2 losses, and 2 draws. After a short respite the players will resume their struggle with three games which are to be played at Heidelberg. Inasmuch as Alekhine needs only two more victories to make his title secure, there is a possibility of the match being finished in that city.

The present match has proved unusual, in there having been six games out of the eight which have gone to a decision. No draws have been recorded since the third partie. And while we are on the subject of curious features it might be well to point out that the player of the white pieces has won five times, Alekhine winning the only game won with the black pieces, the eighth.

The match has offered no astounding deviations in opening play, both players electing P—Q4 with the white pieces and defending more or less irregularly with black in every instance. An abbreviated summary of the play to date is appended. Alekhine has the white pieces in the odd-numbered games.

Game.	Winner.	Moves.
1	Alekhine	26
2	Drawn	40
3	Drawn	66
4	Bogoljubow	38
5	Alekhine	48
6	Bogoljubow	48
7	Alekhine	35
8	Alekhine	30

In a series of articles appearing in the New York Times, Alekhine attributed the outcome of the fourth and fifth games to unsound tactics in the development of the pieces. In his opinion both contestants have exhibited a tendency to take risks when playing the black side. At the conclusion of the sixth game the champion announced that he had not yet struck his real stride, but the outcome of the seventh and eighth games have probably given him cause for reversing this belief.

Three of the games are given elsewhere in this column. In the fourth game Alekhine sacrificed a pawn on his twenty-first move, envisioning a promising attack on his opponent's king. His postgame verdict is that the sacrifice was sound but that he should have continued with 22. ..... Kt-QKt3. Alekhine contends that Bogoljubow might have drawn both the fifth and seventh game and attributes his failures to the fact that the challenger does not possess endgame position judgment equal to that of some of the highest ranking masters, for example, Capablanca. He believes that Bogoljubow is exceptionally powerful on opening-theoretics.

The eighth game of the match has proved to be one of the most interesting to date. The champion allowed Bogoljubow to build up a strong center pawn position, while he occupied himself with a concentration on the king's side which ultimately lead to his knight sacrifice and victory.

Budapest Tournament.

Capablanca, as was to be expected, emerged the victor in the tournament just completed at Budapest, finishing a full game ahead of his nearest competitor, Rubinstein. Tartakower carried off third prize, Thomas and Vajda divided fourth and fifth, Steiner took sixth and Colle and Havasi split seventh, the last prize winning position.

Out of the 91 games contested in the tourney, white players won 35, black players won 27 and 29 were drawn. The white advantage may again best be demonstrated, however, by limiting the study to the play of the first five prize winners. These players won nineteen games with the white pieces and lost but two; their records with the black pieces comprised twelve victories and eight defeats. Drawn games were recorded thirteen times, with the white pieces and eleven times with the black pieces.

15,900 FATALITIES IN TRAFFIC DECRIED

Deaths First Seven Months of This Year Laid to Careless Drivers.

MANY VICTIMS CHILDREN

An average of more than three deaths in the United States every hour of every day in July was caused by motor vehicle accidents. This in the face of the myriad safety factors that are built into and near the modern highway and city street.

Cities, States, railroad companies and automobile manufacturers now spend millions of dollars annually to protect and preserve citizens who participate in present day vehicle and pedestrian traffic. Yet motor vehicle deaths in July exceeded those in June, and the total deaths to date in 1929 show an increase of 6 per cent, as compared with the similar period of last year.

The first seven months of 1929 saw an estimated total of 15,900 persons met death on America's highways and city streets. This number is only a small portion of the great army of victims who were not killed, many of whom were maimed for life, many never to walk again, some never to see, each a personal tragedy and an economic loss to the Nation.

35 Hurt to One Killed.

Representative States report about 35 serious nonfatal accidents to each fatality. On that basis, more than 500,000 persons can be estimated as the toll of serious injuries in traffic thus far in 1929. Based on the studies of costs of motor vehicle accidents made by the statistics committee of the National Conference on Street and Highway Safety, a conservative figure of the cost of highway accidents for this year will reach above $1,000,000,000.

Stirred to action by the ever-soaring figures on traffic deaths, the traffic committee of the American Road Builders Association is sponsoring its third annual highway safety campaign.

A survey is being made with a view to ascertaining what remedies might be most effective in halting this fearful loss of human lives.

It has been found, according to the association, that proper measures for safety are going into the building of highways and of vehicles to operate over them, and that the greater blame, as in all previous investigations, must be laid at the door of the reckless driver and the unwary pedestrian.

Most Victims Pedestrians.

Consulting the National Safety Council figures for July, it is found that pedestrian deaths continue to lead the list of traffic fatalities, taking 54 per cent of the total number. Thirty-seven per cent of the pedestrians killed were children under 15 years of age.

The American Road Builders' Association believes in increasing education of children on highway safety matters. It is heartily in favor of school lessons, drills and plays on the subject, of school boy patrols and of all other methods that will instill caution into youthful minds.

Not the sort of education that will break down youthful spirits by thoughts of constant danger, but the development of ingrained caution, such as that which keeps a child away from a red-hot stove.

As for adults, drivers and pedestrians, the association believes that they can be taught highway safety most effectively by practical, uniform laws that apply to all moving traffic, whether pedestrian or vehicular, and their rigid and impartial enforcement.

Regulation of Pedestrians.

Pedestrians should obey traffic laws to make streets and highways safe for themselves and for drivers, it is held. There can be no safety where one group of traffic moves under strict regulation with traffic lights and police direction, while at the same time in the same area, another group moves as it pleases, with no regulation at all.

There were 90 less motor vehicle fatalities in Chicago during the first six month of 1929 than during the corresponding period of 1928. There were 4,000 arrests for speeding, reckless driving and running past stop lights for the first six months of 1928, and 10,000 such arrests during the first six months of 1929.

Chicago's experience is evidence that strict traffic law enforcement pays well in human dividends. These additional 6,000 arrests probably had much to do with the saving of 90 lives.

Traffic laws, it is believed, must of necessity be practical and of a nature to speed traffic movement, rather than slow it down. No amount of safety devices or safety education will change the habitually reckless driver or pedestrian. It requires laws and their enforcement to do that, it is held.

Dogs Devour 11 Birds Having Large Value

New York, Sept. 21.—Stray dogs found near Hermann Park Zoo will be shot on sight.

That is the warning Park Superintendent Clarence Brock issued after dogs had entered zoo cages and killed eleven birds valued at $300.

The raid marked the first time in which zoo cages have been entered by dogs, according to Mr. Brock.

The raiders gained entrance to the grounds by crawling through a hole in an outside fence. Entrance to the cage was made when wire was torn at the top. Specimens killed included six ringneck hens, valued at $50; a ringneck rooster valued at $10; two silver pheasants valued at $30; a pair of Reeves pheasant valued at $50; a Manchurian pheasant valued at $75, and a guan valued at $35.

How to Keep Well

By DR. W. A. EVANS

To the limit of space questions pertaining to hygiene and prevention of disease will be answered in this column. Personal replies will be made to inquiries, under proper limitations, when return stamped envelope is inclosed. Dr. Evans will not make diagnosis or prescribe for individual disease.

SWIMMING AND SINUS ILLS.

INSTEAD of catarrh we now say a person has sinusitis or sinus trouble. Some physicians say that the flair for swimming which grips the people now is causing a great increase in sinus trouble and in otitis, the new name for catarrh of the ear. To my mind the evidence is not conclusive, since in the old days the complaint of catarrh was almost universal. It is not certain that the complaint of sinus trouble is so general. However, there are many physicians who warn people against swimming because of the danger to the nose and ears.

Dr. G. C. Saunders, now a nose specialist, came to his profession by way of positions as swimming teacher and playground director. He thinks swimmers are in considerable danger of infecting their ears and sinuses. He has devised a clamp for the nostrils which he advises his patients to use when they swim. All swimmers are advised to breath through the mouth as much as possible while swimming. In this exercise mouth breathing has all of the advantages and none of the disadvantages which are urged against it under other circumstances. Clamping of the nostrils helps the swimmer to breathe through the mouth.

Some instructors advise their pupils to plug the nostrils with greased cotton. Dr. Skillern advises them to protect against sinus infection by spraying the nostrils with an oil. Dr. Saunders advises against jumping into the water feet first and playing water polo because of the danger to the sinuses. Swimming in dirty water very greatly increases the danger.

In one instance there was a long list of sinus infections among men using a polluted pool. The walls were cleaned and the water in the pool was filtered and sterilized, whereupon the report of infections came to an end.

To protect the ears some swimmers use plugs made of greased cotton. Some use rubber plugs. Both are effective.

MAY BE DUE TO PARASITE.

T. Y. writes:

1. A group of girls rented a cottage in the country and swam daily in a nearby lake. They broke out with an itchy rash much like a mosquito bite on the parts of their skin that the bathing suit did not cover. The beach was shallow and there were lots of reeds nearby. I would like to rent this cottage, but after their experience wonder if it is advisable. What would be the cause?

1. My guess is that the rash is due to a parasite. We had a story about this rash last summer. If you use this pond this summer you may expect to enjoy the same rash.

ALPINE DWELLERS RUSHING TO CITIES

Italian Government, Alarmed, Trying to Stop Exodus From Mountains.

AIDS IN VARIOUS WAYS

Turin, Italy, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Thoroughly alarmed by the rapid depopulation of the Italian Alps, the government is taking extensive measures to keep the present inhabitants in their villages and to induce other persons to make their homes in the mountains.

The attraction of the cities of the plains has proved almost too much for the old mountaineer stock. The Alps are becoming deserted. From 1881 to today Beaulard descended from 1,029 to 624 inhabitants; Locana from 6,500 to 4,700. In twenty years Cesana dropped from 1,205 to 771 persons, Novalesa from 1,638 to 1,000 Salomina from 309 to 100.

What this means to Italy was expressed by the Giornale D'Italia, a Rome daily, which said:

"The mountains in Italy are the frontier and the frontier must not be depopulated. Its zone ought to designate the linguistic boundary and to furnish an ever alert guard.

"The mountains create the Alpini, who are the typical and necessary army of Italy."

Two years ago, the government took its first step toward countering this danger by authorizing the expenditure of 2,000,000 lire for streets, irrigation and other improvements in the mountains. Also it passed reforestation laws which in time will create a new calling of foresters.

SCORES IN PRISONS DUE FOR LIFE TERM

Michigan Fourth Offenses Are Discovered After Sentence Is Given.

100 PRISONERS TRAPPED

Special to The Washington Post.

Lansing, Mich., Sept. 21.—Life sentences for scores of persons now in Michigan penal institutions will be sought by the department of public safety and Arthur D. Wood, commissioner of pardons and paroles.

Preliminary investigation by Lieut. H. E. Erickson of the department's bureau of identification indicates that at least 100 Michigan prison inmates are eligible for the life sentence under the fourth offender provisions of the criminal code. In every case the latest felony was committed after the criminal code became effective. The fact that the criminal had committed three or more previous felonies was discovered by the State police after sentence had been pronounced.

Oscar G. Olander, commissioner of public safety, has instructed Lieut. Erickson to make an investigation of the record of every persons now in prison. The wardens of the penal institutions will cooperate in the task. When it appears that an inmate has been convicted of felony in another State officials records and photographs will be obtained from the State in question.

Is Fourth Offender.

Once it is definitely established that an inmate is a fourth offender, full documentary evidence will be sent to the prosecuting attorney of the county from which he was sentenced, with a form letter quoting the fourth offender provisions of the criminal code and recommending that the inmate be prosecuted as an habitual offender. The life sentence is mandatory on conviction. Both Mr. Wood and Mr. Olander will sign the form letter. Copies will go to Gov. Fred W. Green and Attorney General Wilber M. Brucker in every case.

The form letter, already drafted, quotes these sections of the criminal code:

Whenever it shall become known to any warden, or prison, probation, parole or other peace officer that any person charged with or convicted of a felony has been previously convicted within the meaning of the three preceding sections, it shall become his duty forthwith to report the facts to the prosecuting attorney of the county in which such person is charged or was sentenced.

Process After Conviction.

"If at any time after conviction and either before or after sentence it shall appear that a person convicted of a felony has previously been convicted of crimes as set forth in any of the three foregoing sections, it shall be the duty of the prosecuting attorney of the county in which such conviction was had to file an information in such cause accusing the person of such previous convictions."

In the opinion of Mr. Olander and Mr. Wood, the law gives the prosecuting attorney no choice but to proceed against the inmate in accordance with their recommendations. Refusal or neglect to do so probably would lead to action against the prosecutor by the Attorney General's office.

NEWS AND NOTES OF CAPITAL VETERANS' ORGANIZATIONS

AMERICAN LEGION.

Meetings this week:

Tuesday — Victory Post, Woodmen's Hall, 935 Grant place, 8 p. m.

Wednesday—Henry C. Spengler Post, Thomas Circle Club, 8 p. m.

Final arrangements for the departure Saturday evening of the delegation representing the Department of the District of Columbia, the American Legion, at the eleventh annual national convention at Louisville, Ky., are being made and from the present outlook the special train will carry the largest number of legionnaires ever attending a national convention.

The train will leave at 6:30 o'clock over the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, which was selected by the Department Louisville convention travel committee as the official route, and will arrive at the convention city Sunday morning at 11:15 o'clock. The convention will convene Monday, September 30, and continue through October 1, 2 and 3. The headquarters of the District delegation will be in the Brown Hotel. The special train will be in charge of L. O. Drumwright, city passenger agent of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, who is also a legionnaire of the local department.

Included in the special train will be one car containing members of the New Jersey Department of the Legion and two car loads of legionnaires from the Department of Maryland, who were invited by the committee to make the trip with the District outfit. There is a possibility that many of the legionnaires from nearby Virginia will accept an invitation extended to them to join in the trip to the Blue Grass State. An observation car will be attached to the rear of the special, with an illuminated sign bearing the words, "The American Legion, Departments of the District of Columbia and Maryland."

Preparations are under way for taking the Victory and Vincent B. Costello Drum and Bugle Corps to head the District delegation in the big parade Tuesday morning, October 1, starting over the two-mile course at 11 o'clock. Jumping from fifty-second place in parades in previous years to second place this year, with the possibility of leading the entire parade comprised of 58 departments, is one of the outstanding accomplishments during the administration of Harlan Wood, who was department commander last year.

First in Parade.

The fact that the department of Hawaii, which was assigned first position in the parade, due to showing the highest percentage gain in membership gain during the past year, in which the Department of the District of Columbia finished a close second, is so many miles distant from the convention city and is not likely to send a delegation means that the District legionnaires will be out in first place for the first time in the history of the local department. Department Commander L. E. Atkins as well as Past Department Commander Harlan Wood are both going to the convention as delegates and will be aboard the special train when it pulls out next Saturday night. In addition several of the national officers will be in the party and the trip is expected to be an enjoyable one.

The delegation will arrive in Louisville Sunday morning in time for the members who have been assigned to the various national convention committees to attend sessions of their respective committees. A meeting of the national executive committee is scheduled for Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock, which will be attended by National Executive Committeeman Paul J. McGahan, who will be aboard the special train with the District delegation. The recent convention passed a number of important resolutions which will be presented by the delegation before the various convention committees for action.

Past Department Commander Julius I. Peyser, of this department, a member of Vincent B. Costello Post, will be a candidate for one of the five national vice commanderships, when the election takes place on Thursday, October 3. At a meeting of the department executive committee held last Monday night in the board room, District Building, he was unanimously indorsed for that high office. He arrived yesterday in New York from an extended European trip, having been a member of the "American Legion Commanders Tour" which was headed by National Commander Paul V. McNutt. While abroad he was elected vice president of the Federation Interalliee Des Anciens Combatants (F. I. D. A. C.) at Belgrade and was the only American to be honored with an office in this veterans organization.

Standing Committees Named.

Department Commander Atkins has been busily engaged during the past week appointing some of the standing committees for the ensuing year and also selecting members of his official staff who will serve until the next annual department convention in 1930.

Among the committees appointed by him and announced yesterday are the following:

Budget—Daniel J. Donovan, chairman; Watson B. Miller, W. L. A. Strawbridge.

Civic relations—Wallace Streater, chairman; J. Thad Baker, Arthur A. Chenay, Clayton E. Emig, Henry G. Pratt, Julius I. Peyser, Lillian Regan, Mabel F. Staub, H. L. Wilson.

Veterans preference—Harlan Wood, chairman; Amelia Boberg, Eugene A. Costello, Thomas J. Frailey, Francis F. Miller, Paul J. McGahan, Julius I. Peyser.

Veterans flag committee—Amos A. Fries, John W. Shultz, George F. Unmacht.

Trophies and awards—Paul J. McGahan, chairman; Forest F. Bartl, Austin S. Imirie, Norman B. Landreau.

Mr. McGeough has been very active in legion affairs, he having twice been commander of the Navy and Marine Post at Great Lakes, Ill., and later commander of the eighth district of Illinois. During the year 1928, with McGeough as its leader, that district led all the other districts of the State. McGeough is secretary of the Fleet Reserve Association and editor of the Fleet Reserve Magazine. Mr. Shultz is a past commander of Robley D. Evans Post and served as finance officer of the department of the District of Columbia during Gen. Amos H. Fries' term as department commander. He is connected with the auditing division of the United States Shipping Board.

Other committee appointments will be announced at the next meeting.

Victory Post has again been honored by the appointment of its commander, W. L. A. Strawbridge, to serve on the budget committee of the department of District of Columbia for the year 1929-1930.

268 STUDENT FLIERS ENROLL IN AIR CORPS

New Classes at Brooks and March Fields to Form October 15.

MANY FROM WEST POINT

New classes for primary flying schools, which form October 15, will find 268 students starting training at the two primary flying schools of the Army—Brooks Field, San Antonio, Tex., and March Field, Riverside, Calif., the War Department announces. The majority of the new students (129) are officers of the various branches of the Regular Army, detailed to the Air Corps for flying training, of which 81 will attend the Brooks Field School and 48 the one at March Field.

All of the student officers going to March Field are graduates of the June, 1929, class of the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., and this holds true of 58 of the officers going to Brooks Field. Altogether 106 members of the June, 1929, graduating class of the Military Academy, or 35 per cent, were detailed to the Air Corps for flying training.

In the new classes will be 124 students from civil life, and the remaining 15 students are enlisted men of the Regular Army. The list of eligible candidates for appointment from civil life numbered over 600 names, among them many college graduates, but lack of accommodations at the two primary flying schools made it necessary to limit appointments.

California Takes Lead.

California leads in the number of native sons with a total of 19 candidates, Illinois being next in line with 9.

The course at the schools is of eight months' duration, followed by a four-month course at the Advanced Flying School at Kelly Field, Tex. Cadets and enlisted men successfully completing the year's course are commissioned as second lieutenants in the Air Corps Reserve, and in the past many of the graduates have accepted a year's active duty under their status as reserve officers, while a number have passed the examination for appointment in the Air Corps of the Regular Army.

In accordance with regulations recently issued by the War Department hereafter graduates of the Air Corps Advanced Flying School at Kelly Field will be required to serve in the Army for two years following their graduation.

Choice Formerly Allowed.

Formerly, after receiving this training, the graduates were able to choose between serving two years with the Air Corps or accepting positions in the commercial field.

Under the five-year program for the expansion of the Air Corps every effort is being made to fill the quota of officers required by its terms, the final number being 1,650 officers of the Regular Army Air Corps and 550 reserve officers on extended active duty. Funds for carrying on the training of new flying personnel are limited and the War Department feels that the Army, having trained a pilot, should have a prior claim on his services for at least two years following the completion of his flying training.

The new regulations require flying cadets to enlist at the time of their appointment for a period of three years, one of which will ordinarily be devoted to his training and the two remaining years to a tour of active duty as a reserve or regular officer in the grade of second lieutenant.

Naval Dental Corps Examination Dec. 2

An examination for appointment in the Naval Dental Corps is scheduled to begin December 2 at the United States Naval Medical School here, the Naval Bureau of Medicine and Surgery has announced.

To be eligible for appointment in the Dental Corps a candidate must be a citizen of the United States, between the ages of 21 and 32 years old, a graduate of a standard dental college and of unquestionable professional repute, the announcement states.

JADWIN TO GET PAY OF OBSOLETE RANK

ACT OF 1915 IS CAUSE

Lieut. Gen. Edgar Jadwin, retired, former chief of engineers of the Army, is to receive the retirement pay of a lieutenant general despite the fact that the grade was abolished by act of Congress more than twenty years ago, the War Department has announced.

Gen. Jadwin, who at the time of his retirement on August 7 was a major general, was retired as a lieutenant general under the provision of the act of March 4, 1915, which provided "that such officers of the Army and Navy as were detailed with the Isthmian Canal Commission on the Isthmus of Panama for more than three years and who shall not have been advanced in rank by any other provision of this bill shall be advanced one grade in rank upon retirement." It was in accordance with this act that Gen. Jadwin was retired as lieutenant general.

However, the question arose as to whether he was entitled to the retired pay of that grade in view of the fact that it was abolished by an act of March 2, 1907. This act provided that nothing therein should affect the retired list, and in view of the fact that the section of the revised statutes fixing the pay of a lieutenant general at $11,000 per annum has not been repealed by any other statute, the Comptroller General of the United States has ruled that Gen. Jadwin is entitled to three-fourths of $11,000 per annum.

The presentation was made by Assistant Secretary of War Patrick J. Hurley, who is also president of the National Rifle Association, and in the presence of Gen. Charles P. FUQUA VIEWS NEW ARMY EXPERIMENT

Innovations in Battalion Organization Is Tried Out at Fort Benning.

CHANGES ARE NUMEROUS

Maj. Gen. Stephen O. Fuqua, chief of infantry, spent several days last week observing experiments now in progress at the Infantry School, Fort Benning, Ga., with new types of war strength infantry battalion organizations.

A short time ago, in an effort to obtain a more powerful fighting unit than the present war battalion, the War Department directed experimentation with various new types of battalion organization utilizing additional existing automatic weapons and equipment. The Twenty-ninth Infantry, under the supervision of the infantry board, is conducting the experiments, and it is expected that they will be completed by December 1.

In general, three types of organization are being tried out, one having a headquarters company, four rifle companies and one machine gun company; another having a headquarters company, two rifle companies and two machine gun companies, and a third having a headquarters company, three rifle companies and two machine gun companies.

These experimental organizations differ materially from the present authorized war strength battalion, which contains a headquarters company, three rifle companies, and one machine gun company. A number of changes have also been made in the size, number and armament of the interior units of the experimental battalions.

New Submarine's Sponsor Selected

Secretary of Navy's Wife to Officiate as V-5 Is Launched.

The submarine V-5, now under construction at the Navy Yard at Portsmouth, N. H., will have Mrs. Charles Francis Adams, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, as its sponsor when it is launched December 17, the Navy Department has announced.

The V-5 is a cruiser type, fleet submarine of 371 feet length over all, 33 feet 3 inches extreme breadth, 15 feet 11 inches mean draft and an estimated displacement of 2,760 tons on the surface and 3,960 submerged. Funds for its construction and that of its sister ship, the V-6, now under construction at the Mare Island Navy Yard, were appropriated in February, 1925.

They were authorized by act of Congress August 29, 1916, in a program of nine submarines, four of which are built—the V-1, V-2, V-3 and V-4—and are now operating as division 20, submarine division, battle fleet. No funds have been appropriated for the remaining three submarines authorized by the act of 1916.

Queer Causes of Mishaps Found by Insurance Men

"Accidents" suggest automobiles, grade crossings, aeroplanes, explosions, or high speed machinery. But a recent survey of the injuries listed in claims under workmen's compensation insurance reveals that even the decorative daffodil, a timorous mouse, or the wind at the Battery wall may be the cause of an accident that means months in a hospital for the victim.

The cook in a small home for the aged in a New York suburb was cooling her pet pudding on the back porch. Occasionally she went to "keep an eye on it." So did a stray cat. Eventually cook and cat met at the pudding bowl. The cat dodged a mighty kick and streaked away unharmed. But the cook's 200 pounds came down hard in a four-point landing. The cook spent three months in a hospital.

A Long Island man took a job in a greenhouse because he liked flowers. He was interested especially in caring for a bed of golden daffodils. But he did not know that beneath the yellow brilliance the plants hid a subtle poison. One day an abrasion on his ankle became infected. For the next few months he enjoyed flowers in a hospital ward, and was lucky to escape having his foot amputated.

Oddly acquired injuries come to light frequently through the claims work of the New York State Insurance Fund, which is the largest carrier of compensation insurance in the State. A perusal of the claim files at the home office of the State Fund at No. 432 Fourth avenue discloses that hidden perils often beset the most innocent appearing circumstances.

A few of the claims out of the thousands handled every year by the State Fund no doubt owe much of their oddity to vivid imaginations on the part of the claimants, but as every claim is investigated the truth of scores of unusual accidents actually is established and proper claims of the victims promptly paid.

A Palisades Interstate Park guard picked up bits of paper that marred the park's beauty. One large piece had been selected as a shelter by a copperhead snake. The snake objected to losing its shelter and bit the guard's hand. Commandeered automobiles carried the victim to a physician and the man's life was saved.

An elderly man engaged to run errands could not cope with a strong wind at the Battery. He was blown against a railing and his leg severely injured.

Some danger lurks in the current fashion—a girl forgot she had placed a needle in the hem of her skirt. Her leg struck against a table. The needle was driven into her leg just above the knee.

A man who tried to catch a pencil that fell from its parking place behind his ear was incapacitated for a week. The point stabbed his palm.

A spider in the cellar bit a plumber.

A machine at which a girl was working broke with a crash that sounded like an explosion. The girl's facial muscles became paralyzed from the fright.

A school principal handed a diploma to a girl graduate. With it he presented a bouquet of roses a relative had sent. A thorn pricked his finger and blood poisoning developed. He was incapacitated for several months, and the courts awarded him compensation, holding that the injury was received in the course of his employment.

A bookkeeper turned his head suddenly and a pen in his hand pierced his nose. Infection developed that brought on a fatal brain abscess.

Here are two unusual allegations that came to the State Fund:

A girl who fell on the marble floor of a large office building admits she did not break any bones—in fact did not even suffer a bruise. But she insists that she "caught cold."

A delivery boy, who says that in accordance with safety instructions he waited for the proper signal light before crossing Fifth avenue traffic, alleges that as a result he was incapacitated by inhaling the fumes from passing automobiles.

Even the safety of the home may be overestimated.

"It is not generally realized," said Charles G. Smith, manager of the State Fund, "that about one-fourth of all fatal accidents are in the home. The best information is that there were approximately 100,000 persons killed in accidents of all knids in the United States last year, and that about 25,000 of these deaths occurred in the home."

TWO ARE AS CHEAP AS ONE

The old saying that "two can live as cheaply as one" could be paraphrased with more truth into "Two automobiles are as cheap as one" . . . provided that one is a used car. The greatest factor of automobile cost is probably depreciation, and you can save wear and tear on a new car by using an inexpensive used car for business purposes and in adverse weather . . . Why not buy one of the low priced cars listed in the Want Ad columns of this paper today? One that will stand rough usage, that you will not bother to wash and polish so frequently and that you can allow the young folks to use without worrying about upholstery or marred finish . . . You will find such cars listed today on this page.

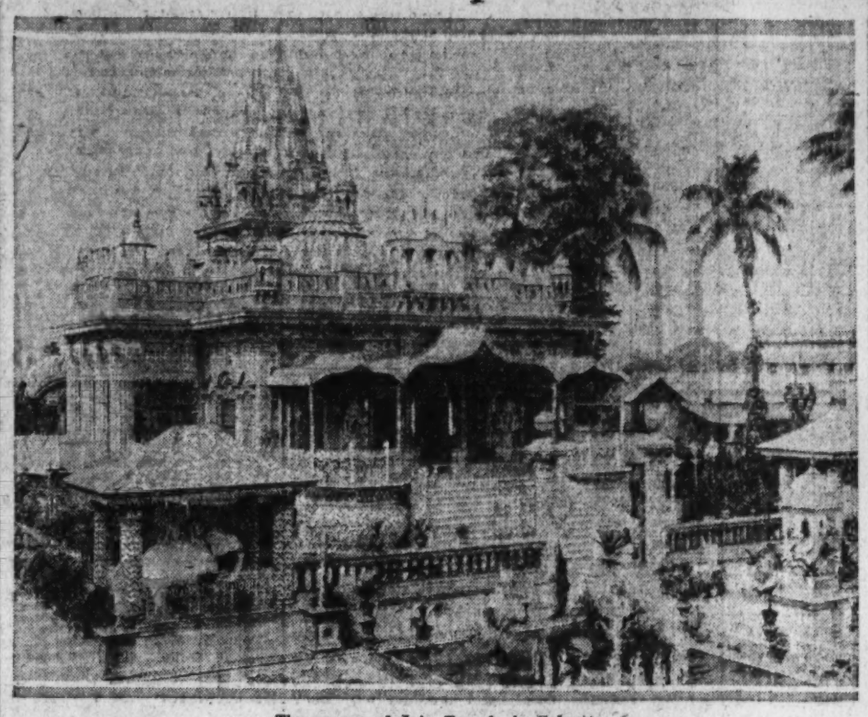
Religions of India Amaze and Shock With Animal Worship and Devil Dances



The renowned Jain Temple in Calcutta.

Materialism in America Found Far Superior to Hindu Spirituality.

By ROBERT MOUNTSIER.

En Route in India.

To an American with an orderly mind and a clean body India is the land of impossibilities become actualities, and for that very reason it ranks high as one of the world's most interesting countries.

Look for a reason behind all the seemingly impossible things seen in India and the traditions and superstitions of India's religions are found responsible. Here, to an extent seen in few other countries, religions have determined the thought and character of the people, shaping their history and making them what they are today.

Abroad much is heard of Hindu "spirituality," so called, but if what one sees in India today is spirituality we Americans, accused everywhere of gross materialism, are all holy men praying in the wilderness. Hinduism, as now practiced by the masses, means sensuality, filth, degradation, child marriage, the worship of revolting idols and animals, the degradation of women, the social ostracism of widows and the blighting influence of caste.

More than two-thirds of India's 330,000,000 inhabitants are Hindus, practicing some form of Brahminism, and their extraordinary forms of worship and preparations for the next world are outstanding among 70,000,000 Mohammedans, 11,500,000 Buddhists, 4,750,000 Christians, 1,200,000 Jains and 100,000 Parsees.

Things That Amaze.

To travelers from Europe and America the most amazing features of native life in India are the ghats where the bodies of Hindus are publicly cremated, the Parsees' exposure of their dead to vultures, the reverence shown to "sacred" animals, insanitary practices such as make the Ganges at Benares an almost nauseating sight, the life of prostitution forced upon tens of thousands of young girls in the name of religion, and religious ceremonies as conducted in public.

The best city in which to see Hinduism in everyday operation is Calcutta, with its famous burning ghats and its notorious Temple of Kali. Religion is much in evidence in this Indian metropolis. However, it has few Buddhists, although Buddha was born nearby, and a relatively small number of Brahmins, for Brahminism, which requires a reading of the Vedic texts, is the property of the learned among the highest of India's 1,886 distinct castes. Less than 10 per cent of the men of India and only 2 per cent of the women are able to read, so in the religious beliefs and performances of the mass of people are found decidedly primitive forms of worship.

The religion of the common people is Hinduism, a confused jumble of sects and beliefs based on a multitude of gods, goddesses and devils, on magic and a mass of superstitions—the whole an outgrowth of the Brahmins' alliance with the primitive and cruder forms of religion in order to counteract the Buddhist reformation.

It is the general belief outside the country that the adherents of Hinduism adore their famous trinity made up of Brahma, the spirit of creation; Shiva, the spirit of destruction, and Vishnu, the spirit of consolation and preservation. But Brahma is not a favorite god of the people; the popular deity is Shiva, the destroyer, with Vishnu a poor second. And along with them is a degrading worship of animals, in which cows, bulls, monkeys, elephants, tigers, peacocks, cobras, crocodiles and other beasts and birds play an important part.

Calcutta's Temple.

Although called the merciful, Shiva is none the less a god of terror, and Kali, one of his three wives, is the Terrible One, a grotesque monster of cruelty and bloodthirstiness, with four arms, three red eyes and a scarlet tongue which hangs down to the waist, the bleeding head of a victim in one hand, a sacrificial sword in another, all topped off with a necklace of human skulls.

Such is the image of the goddess at Calcutta's famous temple, which derives special sanctity among thousands of Kali temples from the legend that when the corpse of Kali was cut into pieces by order of the gods and chopped up by the disk of Vishnu one of her fingers fell on this spot. The temple, an ugly, dirty structure of mud and plaster, is supposed to have been built three centuries ago, and from the name of the place, Kalighat, Calcutta took its name.

There was a time when sacrifices of children were made to this Kali; nowadays goats are used as substitute. Here are the posts to which they are fastened for the cutting off of their heads, and only too plain are the signs that sacrifices have recently been made. Flies, dogs, cats and dirt predominate, and children stand around looking at our party turning up noses at the odors and the unpleasant sights.

Half-naked sadhus, or religious fakirs—the word "fakir" is the Arabic for "poor"—ask for alms or hold out beseeching hands; to us they are no more than more beggars among beggars, who include the halt, the lame and the blind, also, most revolting of all, a leper. Safe and sound in their holiness, yogis sit on the temple floor, small fires before them as bells, drums and voices add to the confusion. Sacred cows wander unmolested through the temple courtyard. Venders sell cucumbers, curds, white pumpkins, candy as offerings to propitiate Kali, while priests perform ceremonies and ask for money.

Women desiring sons are praying under a champa tree in the corner of the temple yard, the branches decorated with a myriad of bits of colored cloth by the hundreds of barren mothers who have been there before them. Yes, and before our eyes, as if so much proof of the virtue of the tree, stands a small boy who came in answer to a prayer offered up here about four years before. He is being ceremoniously shaved as to the hair on his head by a priest of the goddess Kali and arrayed in a new costume and a lot of bejeweled ornaments, while the proud mother looks on and temple attendants jazz up the religious proceedings with bagpipe, cymbals and two drums, big and kettle.

A Goat Is Killed.

This ceremony serves as an interesting sideshow in this temple of the cruel and bloodthirsty goddess, but a member of our party, a minister of a New Thought Church and amateur taker of moving pictures, is out for blood. He wishes a goat sacrificed so he can show the folks back home how benighted these Hindus are.

"We want the priests to kill a goat right here and now," the minister informed the guide. "How much will it cost? It doesn't have to be a big goat."

So after the guide had gone into conference with a priest it was announced that the sacrifice of a small he-goat would cost 9 rupees, or $3.42 at the present rate of exchange. The money was forthcoming and out came the poor animal to satisfy Kali the Terrible, and the minister of the New Thought Church.

As he ma-a-a-ed just like an American goat they tied that poor little Hindu animal to a post and decapitated him with a single blow of the sacrificial knife, while the Christian cameramen cranked their machines. If it had taken more than one stroke to do the deed, it would not have counted so far as Kali was concerned. Maybe it didn't anyway, but if the killing of that goat was a sacrifice to Kali, then the chopping off of a chicken's head for Sunday dinner in the U. S. A. is a religious ceremony.

The guide told us that the heads of the sacrificed goats are given to the poor and the bodies taken home and eaten by those who foot the bill for them. He also said that 500 beggars are fed by the temple every evening. Let's hope so, for this temple is one of the wealthiest in India, and this is how.

Kalighat was built by a member of the Sabarna Chandhu family, who at one time owned a lot of land in this part of India and allotted 104 acres for the temple's maintenance. The first priest appointed to manage the affairs of the temple was a man by the name of Chandibar and his descendants are the present proprietors of Kalighat. They have amassed a large fortune, not so much from the proceeds of the temple lands as from the offerings of worshipers at the shrine of Kali.

Burning the Dead.

Famous among travelers are Calcutta's burning ghats, one of them Nimtolla Ghat, said to be India's largest, in point of bodies cremated each year. Situated on the banks of the holy Hoogly, a part of the holy Ganges system, this ghat is daily the scene of a varying number of cremations, the bodies brought by relatives and burned in iron racks by small logs of wood as prayers are recited for the welfare of the soul: "O thou departed spirit, I am burning every part of your earthly body, which, being full of passions and ignorance, did pious as well as impious acts. May the Supreme Spirit pardon all sinful acts committed by you either knowingly or unknowingly, and may thou ascend to the heavenly regions."

At the present time the Hindus are quarreling among themselves over the removal of the Kashi Mittar burning ghat, which is considered a menace to the health of the locality. Two years ago a committee of the Calcutta corporation—that is the city council—appointed to go into the question of improving the burning ghats decided that the Kashi Mittar ghat was a public menace and recommended the erection of a crematorium in the Topsia district for the disposal of unclaimed and decomposed human corpses. The corporation accepted the report and when the crematorium was almost ready for receiving bodies a number of Hindus protested to the governor.

Calcutta's public health committee reconsidered the matter and voted that the original scheme be adhered to. But a turban-wearing Mukerji, heading the fundamentalist objectors, advocated a policy of caution, saying that according to the Hindu "sastras" bodies of Hindus should be cremated on the banks of the Ganges and "as such their religious feelings should be respected."

The Mohammedans.

Quite another thing from the Hinduism of the Kali Temple and of the burning ghats is Calcutta's principal Jain Temple, in the Halsi Bagan road. Against a background of factory chimneys it rises, a showy, spectacular structure, clean but badly worn in spots, with colorfully tiled gatehouse, garden with flowers, fountain, peacocks and statuary, and the Shish Mahal, or "Palace of Mirrors," inclosing the holy of holies, where the white marble Jain god sits enthroned and embowered by roses on an iridescent crystal altar, brilliant with many lights. The Jain religion, contemporary with Buddhism, has as its cardinal principle the belief that "regard for life is the highest virtue." The Jains believe in reincarnation and they worship innumerable deified mortals, of whom 24 Tirthankaras, or Liberated Ones, are chief. Although a small community here in Calcutta, they are rich and powerful, representing the best type of merchants, among them dealers in cloth and jewels.

Although numbering less than a third of the Hindus, the Mohammedans are a more powerful and intelligent class. If the British withdrew from India or were driven out there seems to be little doubt that the people who respond to the call, "La ilaha illa 'llah Muhammadun Rasulu 'llah" ("There is no God but Allah, and Mohammed is his Prophet"), would dominate India, as they did in the centuries of the Moguls.

Of the 11,000,000 and more Buddhists in India, all but 400,000 are in Burma. Buddhism teaches charity, kindness, truth, chastity and self-denial, and in its pure form it is uplifting and ennobling, but the Buddhism of India today is mixed up with Hindu or Animistic superstitions. In one of its impure forms it has a stronghold in the Himalayas, where may be heard daily the centuries old prayer, "Om mani padme hum"—"Hail the jewel in the lotus."

Up in the Mountains.

In Darjeeling and the surrounding country the traveler sees poles bearing flags of printed prayers, with designs representing wild horses supposed to carry the prayers to heaven, and he may "say" hundreds of prayers in a few seconds by rotating big prayer wheels. Also he may see at the leading hotel in Darjeeling the Lalama' so-called devil dances, sacred in their Buddhist symbolism.

To the sounds of a drum beaten violently with carved sticks and of cymbals clashed continuously in the hands of another "musician" the "devils" do their stuff. As a starter two with huge heads come out of the Darjeelian night, sing some weird songs that have never been broadcast and whirl rapidly and skillfully in a long drawn out dance.

Then a couple of big dragons, their mouths snapping and their tails lashing, wind their way through the front door of the hotel and with some fast footwork on the part of the men within they fight and prance and dance. They attack a turtle with a man inside, and then they are driven off by a small boy, dressed as an old man, who up to this point has been powerless to suppress their wild carryings-on.

The grand finale is a lengthy, strenuous bull fight. A couple of two-man bulls, looking like no Occidental bulls, and no Oriental ones either, chase each other around the hotel lobby until they are finally cast out into the cold night by a man with a whip. Except for skillful dancing, it is all pretty crude stuff, but it is good grist to the traveler's mill, for here he sees the extraordinary sight of man conquering devils and dragons and other outlandish creatures.

But at that the most interested spectators are dirty ricksha "boys" and palki carriers, crowding around the door and windows. These fantastics actually mean something to them. To the Western mind they seem decidedly clownish and irreligious, but good Himalayan Buddhists have been known to get so worked up watching the dances that they have fallen over hundred-foot embankments in their excitement.

This weird devil dancing seems very far away from the sacred site of Budda-Gaya, the "Friday Mosque," at Delhi, the Towers of Silence and the immersion of dead and diseased in the Ganges, but this is India, the mother of religions.

STOCK PRICES AGAIN DISPLAY CONFUSION

Market, However, Withstands Heavy Liquidation Fairly Well.

UTILITIES MOVE UPWARD

New York, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—The stock market again had to struggle with heavy liquidation today, but came off considerably better than it did yesterday. Price trends were again highly confusing, a wide assortment of leading industrials and rails losing ground, while utilities were rushed forward rapidly. Declines, however, were moderate, mostly ranging from 1 to 3 points.

There was practically nothing in the day's news to influence the market adversely, save possibly the indications that the debacle in the Hatry stocks in London might be of more serious proportions than expected. Although it is not expected to have any direct reverberations in Wall street, it is believed that it has already resulted in considerable unloading of American stocks held abroad and that this selling may be far from completed.

In general, the business and financial information coming to hand was favorable. The week-end reviews pointed to better retail and wholesale buying, and a little better inquiry for steel products. The outlook in the automobile industry, however, remained uncertain. While some of the makers of expensive cars were said to be stepping up operations, some of the low-priced makers were understood to have slowed up, and dealers' stocks were reported to be fairly sizable. There was no call money market today, but bankers predicted fairly comfortable credit conditions next week.

Overbought Position Corrected.

The further decline in prices were generally described in Wall street as a further correction of an overbought position, accelerated by bearish operations and lack of more definite indications as to the trend of the steel and motor industries. There were unconfirmed rumors that investment trusts were taking profits heavily in order to be able to show favorable realized earnings at the end of the year. It was pointed out, however, that many more large merger and new financing programs are in the immediate offing, and that leading banking interests would therefore be constrained to support the market.

Such issues as U. S. Steel, American Telephone, General Electric, Anaconda, Atchison, Dupont, New York Central Simmons, National Cash Register, Simmons and Westinghouse Electric lost about 2 to 3 points. Union Pacific and Allis Chalmers lost 4, and Case Threshing 5. Radio was again under pressure, closing at 95, off ¾ point.

The aviation stocks were heavy, Curtiss-Wright and Aviation Corporation sagging to new lows. Mexican Seaboard was particularly heavy. It dropped about 7 points to a new low at 21¾, as compared to the year's high of 69¾, but rallying to close at 25. The California gas conservation law is expected seriously to hamper its development plans in that State.

Strong Spot.

Public Service of New Jersey was again a strong spot, rising about 7 points to a new high. Columbus Gas and American and Foreign Power continued to climb into new high ground. United Corporation rose about 5 points to 72¾, within striking distance of its record figure, in response to an analysis placing the market value of its holdings at $431,718,000, equal to $61.50 per share.

Burroughs Adding reached new high ground in response to declaration of an extra dividend of $1, and several specialties, including Foster Wheeler, Chicago, Pneumatic Tool, Mathieson Alkali, and F. G. Shattuck moved into new high territory.

With the exception of American International, which slipped back a couple of points in profit taking, investment trusts were strong. The newly listed Second Ntaional Investors Units rose 11 points to a new peak, and Sterling Securities and Railway and Express gained new high ground, up a couple of points.

Commodities were inclined to sag. Wheat sagged a cent or so a bushel on poor export demand and weak cables, and corn lost about as much on bearish weather forecasts and light case demand. Cotton slightly depressed.

In the foreign exchanges, leading European currencies were a little firmer, but sterling cables held around its low level of the year at $4.84 5/8, well below the incoming gold point, and the Canadian dollar dropped to a discount of a full cent.

GENERAL BOND LIST SHOWS DEPRESSION

Volume of Trading One of Lightest of Year; Convertibles Are Soft.

FOREIGN GROUP IS MIXED

New York, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—Depression of the convertibles was matched by easier tendencies in the more seasoned sections of the bond list today. Volume of trading was one of the lightest of the year for a Saturday, sales totaling just above $4,000,000.

The Public Service of New Jersey 4½ per cent debenture was the only active share feature bond to show a gain, and that hopped up 5 points to the new peak price of 294 as the shares sold in high ground. The Telephone convertibles were particularly soft, American 4½s showing a net loss of 3¾ on moderate selling and the International 4½s declining 3¼ from the previous close. American International 5½s, at a new high on Friday, dropped slightly more than 2 points. Commercial Investment Trust 5½s responded to the announcement of a split-up in the stock by adding another point to yesterday's advance, but the increase appeared on a minor transaction. America J. C. Chemical 5½s slipped down to 113, a low for the current movement, but closed a point above that figure for a small net loss.

There was little of interest elsewhere in the quotation table. Rails, both first grade and secondary, were highly mixed. Chicago & North Western General 4s advanced a point, while among the speculative carriers Seaboard Air Line adjustment 5s showed some improvement. In the industrial list, Boden Mills 6½s and Pennsylvania Dixie Cement 6s went to new lows. Oil company bonds were slightly easier and utilities lethargic.

Foreign obligations displayed an even mixture of nominal declines and advances. Rhinelbe 7s, without warrants, equaled their year's low of 99 on a 3-point loss.

Listed Liberties and Treasury certificates made minor fluctuations on small turnovers.

CHICAGO GRAIN.

Chicago, Sept. 21 (A.P.).—A collapse of almost three cents a bushel in wheat prices today plunged the market below any level touched in the last two months. Numerous holders of the cereal were in the face of enlarged estimates of the world's available supply and news of further gains in Argentina, allaying fears about additional crop curtailment. Also, chances of a railroad embargo against rural shipments of grain to Minneapolis and Duluth tended also to increase selling pressure.

Despite week-end rallies, closing quotations on wheat were nervous at ⅝@1¼c under yesterday's finish. Corn closed ⅝@1¾c down and oats ⅛@⅞@⅜c off, with provisions varying from 25c decline to a rise of 2c.

At times today the only buying support for the wheat market here came from previous sellers who were in position to collect. Many long orders were automatically were executed by downturns that rapidly took place. From the outset, no outstanding influence in the direction of lower values was apparent, which placed the world's available supply of wheat at 436,790 bushels, compared with 233,301,000 bushels a year ago, an increase of 66,888,000 bushels in August as against 5,777,000 bushels increase during that month last year.

Reports that elevator representatives in the Northwest had withdrawn from the market, and that flour mills were making their own prices on protein wheat tended also to force prices lower, said to be that about all the available elevator space both in this country and in Canada was taken with wheat vessels being loaded for winter storage, and that the number of carriers obtainable for this purpose was limited. However, late reports that Argentine skies again had become rainless, and that drought persisted in Australia, helped to induce buying as traders drew to an end, with prices up a cent or more a bushel from the day's bottom range.

Corn and oats went lower in price largely in sympathy with wheat weakness. Besides, seasonable weather for the corn crop was widespread. Oats leaders took notice of reports that Germany was offering oats to Canada at a relatively cheap rate.

Provisions ruled easy, responsive to downturns in the value of hogs.

Curb Review

New York, Sept. 1 (A.P.).—The curb market was highly irregular in extremely heavy trading today. Several bull favorites among the utilities and investment trusts were rushed up rapidly, although reactionary tendencies on the "big board" inspired heavy selling on the part of the public, and many prominent issues closed moderately lower. More than 1,000,000 shares changed hands in the two-hour session, a heavy turnover for this market, and the ticker ran for nearly an hour after the close.

Although industrials were inclined to sag, Crocker Wheeler, old stock continued to provide bullish fireworks, selling up 100 points to 701, as compared to the year's low of 127½. The new stock, resulting from the 10-for-1 split-up, closed at 73, up 8 points. The Insull stocks continued to attract heavy buying. The old Middle West Utilities stock up 21 points to a new high at 525, and the other issues were correspondingly buoyant. Insull Utility Investment and Commonwealth Edison were also strong. American and Foreign Power reached new high ground, but Electric Bond & Share and Electric Investors each eased a point. Central and Southwest Utility and Portland Electric each surged up several points to new high ground.

New Orleans & Great Northern, a comparatively inactive issue, appeared once more on the tape, changing hands at 52, a new high and a gain of 27 points from the previous transaction. Glen Alden Coal was a strong spot, rising 10 points to new high ground. Several of the investment trusts were strong. Capital Administration, American Investors warrants, Mayflower Associates, and National Investors preferred reaching new high ground. Lehman Corporation, however, slipped back 3 points to 122, at which it was offered on Monday at 104, and Cecold as high as 136 during the week. Securities Service was a conspicuous strong spot in the oil and natural Utilities stocks, rising nearly 3 points to a record price above 58, in response to agreement L. Doherty's expectation of an early return to active control of his organization, and his optimistic predictions as to its future, before sailing for Europe last night. United Gas Co. encountered some profit taking, but rallied and closed firm. Most lowells moved in narrow ranges and held steady, although Indiana slipped back a fraction. With the exception of Consolidated Aircraft, which moved up about 3 points, aviation stocks were heavy. Irving Air Chute dropped 6 points to a new low at 20, and closed at 21¾. Aviation securities also reached new low ground.

BANK CLEARINGS

Bank clearings in the United States for the week ended September 19, as reported to Bradstreet's Journal, aggregated $14,828,403,000, as against $14,035,272,000 last week and $12,174,129,000 in this week last year. There is here shown an increase of 5.6 per cent over last week and of 21.8 per cent over the like week a year ago. Canadian clearings aggregated $373,181,000, against $370,802,000 last week and $333,409,000 in this week last year. ADVICE ON INVESTMENTS

By CHARLES W. STORM

Cities Service Common.

M. B. L.—Do you regard Cities Service common as being entirely speculative? What is the essential difference between the stock exchange listings and the curb listings?

Answer—Cities Service common stock must be regarded partly as a speculation and partly as an investment, as while it is subject to wide fluctuations, it, at the same time, possesses fairly attractive investment features. There is little essential difference between listings on the New York Stock Exchange and New York Curb Exchange, about the only difference being that listing requirements on the former are somewhat more rigorous than on the latter. As concerns the several classes of bonds mentioned by you, there is no set rule for determining which class may be the safest for investment and which contains the greatest element of risk. Whether it be a real estate mortgage bond, public utility bond or any other bond referred to, everything depends upon the earnings that are behind each individual bond no matter in what class. There are good, bad and indifferent bonds in all the classifications mentioned. It is, therefore, impossible to say which class of bonds named is the safest for investment or which contains the greatest element of risk.

National Bella Hess Common.

T. J. A.—Will you kindly give me information on National Bella Hess Co. common stock listed on the New York Stock Exchange?

Answer—National Bella Hess common stock is now selling around $41 a share, being down from $71 a share earlier in 1929. The company at present pays dividends at the rate of $1 annually, including extras. It was organized in 1927 as a consolidation of National Cloak & Suit and Bella Hess & Co. Is one of the larger mail-order houses specializing in wearing apparel and dry goods. Income increased sharply in 1928, amounting before preferred stock sinking fund, and on basis of present capitalization, to $3.40 per common share, compared with $0.05 in 1927, $0.37 in 1926. Outlook appears to be for a further considerable increase in income in the current year, from the acquisition of new retail outlets. Company's August sales amounted to $3,161,919, against $1,943,669 in August, 1928, an increase of 62.6 per cent. As a long-term speculation the stock is well thought of in some quarters.

Should Diversify.

S. B.—Recently I bought 100 shares Associated Dry Goods at 67, from which price the stock has declined. Shall I buy 100 shares more to average?

Answer—An attempt to "average" usually results in disappointment. Against the $2.50 a share annual dividend, Associated Dry Goods showed earnings of $3.49 a share in 1928, compared with $4.30 in 1927 and $4.21 in 1926. The company, organized in 1916 as a holding company, controls an important chain of department stores. Current annual dividend has been maintained on the common since issuance in 1925. You have enough, in fact, unless you own other securities you have focused a large amount of capital on a single issue. Why not seek diversification for any additional fund?

Middle West Utilities.

M. H. G.—Will you please give me some information on Middle West Utilities selling on curb around 445. How many times has the stock been split up? Do you consider the shares selling around 41 a good investment?

Answer—The complete recapitalization of the Middle West Utilities Co. has recently been announced, voted on by stockholders last Monday. Under the plan as proposed, all funded debt will be retired and preferred stock will be consolidated into one share. Rights are to be offered to all stockholders for the purchase of additional common at $200 a share on the basis of one share for each four of whatever class held. Completion of this provision will be followed by a 10 for 1 split of common stock and the intention has already been announced to place this new common on an 8 per cent dividend basis, distribution to be made in common stock. The new stock, now selling on the curb at around $41 a share on a when-issued basis represents the old stock split up 10 to 1. In view of the past performances of the old stock and the high earning capacity of the company, the new shares must be regarded in the light of a good speculative investment. The term "blue chip" when applied to a stock means one of very high grade.

About Municipal Bonds.

E. J. M.—For a number of years I have been an investor in municipal bonds. I am anxious to know your opinion regarding the advisability of my continuing as I have in the past.

Answer.—Municipal bonds are as a rule considered very good investments. However, there are many cases where the preferred stocks or bonds of industrial concerns may be regarded in exactly the same light. It might be well, therefore, in order that you may diversify your holdings, that you invest a portion of the $3,000 which you say you now have for investment in some of the bonds or preferred stocks of the class just mentioned and which are from time to time recommended in this column. At the same time, it would be advisable for you to keep $1,000 in the bank and utilize the remainder in the manner suggested.

All Are Good.

D. D.—I find your column interesting. Is any change required in my stocks as follows: Twelve shares General Motors, eight Standard Oil of New York, six American Telephone & Telegraph, five each National Biscuit, International Cement, Gold Dust and Standard Oil of New Jersey?

Answer.—No. You have assurance of regular income. The companies represented are important factors in their lines of industry and earnings have been good. Your next purchase should be bonds.

Advised to Continue Saving in Banks.

Miss T. R.—I am an office worker and have noticed your advice to others. I own no stocks or bonds but have saved $1,000. Do you think I should seek a better income than bank interest?

Answer.—Not now. You wouldn't materially increase it by buying standard securities, nor would you have a reserve for emergencies. You know how to save. Continue with the bank until you accumulate $2,000. Then write to us again.

Should Save Up to $2,000.

R. D.—I own five shares each Pennsylvania Railroad, Bethlehem Steel preferred and Southern Pacific. I have saved an additional $500 which I want to invest. What do you suggest?

Answer.—Don't be in a hurry to invest $500. Build up the amount until you have $2,000. Then write to us for advice. Hold the stocks you already own. They have good earnings back of them. Pennsylvania Railroad is now on a $4 a share annual basis, contrasted with $3.50 annually distributed since November, 1926.

Attractions in the Photoplay Houses

THERE IS, IT SEEMS, A LITTLE DINGUS KNOWN AS THE FADER

By NELSON B. BELL

AS was perhaps nebulously intimated in a recent daily column, in the pursuit of the pleasant duties of a reviewer of photoplays, I have, I fear, in company with numerous others, too often in my innocent ignorance heaped unjust condemnation upon the heads of those responsible for the production of our sound, dialogue and singing pictures.

When in the dialogue films the principals one minute have bellowed in a manner well calculated to blast you right out of your chair and the next have gone into a vocal decline that has faded away into a mere whisper, inaudible even to those seated in the front pews, I have always thought to myself that the gentleman presiding over the "mixer" in the studio was either lamentably careless or woefully inefficient. Or both.

Probably common sense should have guided me to saner conclusions. There is no apparent reason why a gentleman presiding over a "mixer" should by some inspired clairvoyance suddenly become the possessor of minute information concerning the acoustical requirements of every wired house in the country. The best he may reasonably be expected to accomplish is a fairly even recording of sound under the circumstances and conditions in which he is called upon to function. If his playbacks register satisfactorily his job may be considered successfully executed. The retention, or possibly it were better said the reproduction, of the approximate effects he has obtained thereafter becomes the problem and the task of the exhibitor presenting the finished film.

This, I learn, is considerably more of a chore than merely turning on the juice and letting nature take its course at a fixed speed and an unvaried volume of tone as the reels unwind.

It is a matter as complex and exacting in its requirement of an acute ear, nice judgment and keen dramatic intelligence as the synchronization of silent film used to be for the musical director intrusted with the task of scoring features for orchestra. The only essential difference, as I perceive it, is that the element of time is not so important as formerly. The problem becomes one of tone rather than tempo.

* * * *

THE preview of a picture for orchestra in the days of the soundless cinema consisted of an accurate timing of scenes and a charting of the picture's mood and speed of movement in order that suitable melodies might be synchronized with the action as a helpful aid to atmosphere.

To achieve the best results in the projection of a sound, talking or singing picture the same process is necessary, except that the object of the screening becomes to determine what adjustments upon the mechanism known, I believe, as the "fader" will bring about the most natural tonal unity, sound perspective or vocal or instrumental shading.

It is by no means a matter that can be standardized. Each theater presents its own problems in acoustics, dependent upon size, seating arrangement, architectural peculiarities and kindred considerations. A perfect adjustment for a modern 5,000-seat cathedral, for example, might not by any rational process of reasoning be expected to prove the best for, say, an old type flat "shooting gallery" seating a scant 500. Neither is a perfect adjustment for the orchestra floor of that 5,000-seat cathedral necessarily right for the balcony of that same house. It is this very fact that places the responsibility for the effective projection of an articulate celluloid that has played back understandably in the studio inescapably upon the exhibitor playing that picture to his public.

The exhibitor's problem, or the projectionist's if you prefer, is not one that can be solved in a moment. A vast amount of experimentation is vitally necessary and a film often must be run many times before its commotions and conversations begin to take on anything approaching a semblance of realism, let alone reality. Once the proper variations of the fader have been noted and accurately recorded the repeated projection of the picture at its highest point of effectiveness is purely a question of alert attentiveness and a comprehensive understanding of the mechanisms under his control on the part of the operator in charge of the booth.

If a voice roars one minute and whispers the next, without any justification for the discrepancy in the story, you may attribute it to the fact that the projectionist has turned away to powder his nose or has succumbed to some other distraction of comparable importance.

* * * *

THE most efficient system of scoring the acoustical requirements of the given film that has come to my notice was devised by Milton Davis, formerly an ace organist with the Stanley-Crandall company in this city and now a sound expert for the Warner Brothers in territory remote from the District, and is in current use in many of the Warner houses, including, unless I am mistaken, those in the Capital.

Mr. Davis has prepared a chart upon which may be listed every subject on a picture program—feature, newsreels, cartoon, comedy, trailers, song slides, whatnot—together with their running times and a brief outline of the general character of each. There is also a column for reel numbers, others for cues for fader settings and finally those for the actual registration of variations to which the fader is to be subjected.

Assuming arbitrarily that ten is the fader point at which the picture may be expected to emit its sounds to best effect, if during screening ten is found to provide imperfect reproduction the fader is run up or down as volume may need to be increased or diminished in the interest of naturalness of tone and unity of strength.

After this tentative operator's cue sheet has been laid out, the picture is rerun with the sheet as a guide and corrections are made, if needed. The process is continued until the sound tracks have been made to produce a maximum of efficient result. It is sometimes an all night job.

The result, however, amply justifies the effort, for once set, barring serious accident to the projection machines or to the film, there is no reason why the picture so cued should not be perfectly projected throughout its run. That is the result Mr. Davis' system has achieved in the theaters where it is in use.

* * * *

AS far as the machine operator is concerned, if he watches his cue sheet, the method is foolproof. He has before him at all times a chart bearing definite instructions approximately as follows:

Reel 1—Feature: Opening to end of all titles..Fader up to 13
Reel 1—Feature: Whosis, playing and singing..Fader down to 11
Reel 1—Feature: End of song .....Fader to 10
Reel 2—Feature: Miss Blah's first song.....Fader up to 11
Reel 2—Feature: End of song.....Fader to 10
Reel 3—Feature: Whole reel .....Fader at 10

And so on, ad lib, through as many reels as the feature numbers, with the short reels added with identical instructions. The cue sheet I have before me as I write was made to cover a ten-reel special production and indicates fader variations from 9 to 13, with many repetitions of the points intermediate to these numbers, but never in the same order or for equal periods of time.

It is utterly amazing what improvement can be made in the audible effect of a film intelligently charted by the method outlined over the same film arbitrarily run at a fixed fader adjustment, unvaried from the instant the reels begin to turn until they stop, without regard to the obvious demands of plausibility. It is inconceivable that some voice films ever would have been released had they actually been made as noisily imperfect as they sound when heard by the cash customer in a carelessly conducted picture theater. They would not have been.

Heretofore, I have placed the burden of guilt upon the studio recording, which I find to have been wholly fallacious.

If you stop to think of it, the person at the controls can ruin the best phonograph record ever made, convert a delightful radio broadcast into nothing more engaging than static or wreck your automobile. Same thing with a talkie.

Only we are just beginning to find it out.

SKELLY AGAIN A HIT IN HIS ROLE OF SKID

Hal Skelly, popular Broadway stage comedian, played the part of Skid in the stage play, "Burlesque," written by George Manker Watters and Arthur Hopkins, 1,200 times during the remarkable drama's successful stage run.

Then Skelly topped off his record-breaking performance with climactic effect with a brilliant portrayal of the same part for the screen presentation of the play, which Paramount has produced, all-talking, all-singing, all-dancing, under the title of "The Dance of Life," now playing at Loew's Columbia.

Skelly began playing the role on the stage in July, 1927. The company rehearsed the show and presented it on the road for two months before it opened at the Plymouth Theater in New York in September. There it ran for 52 weeks.

Following the New York run, the show went on the road, traveling throughout the East, with Skelly still in the principal part. When Paramount sought him to play the lead in the screen production, "The Dance of Life," Skelly was back in New York, where the play was going the rounds of the smaller theaters. He left the show to go directly to Hollywood and troupe as Skid for the all-talking screen with Nancy Carrol as the girl. During the production of the picture he also acted the part in a Hollywood theater production of the play.

"The Dance of Life," made from "Burlesque," is the principal screen attraction at Loew's Columbia now.

The story is of two troupers who meet in a deserted railroad station and secure through the girl's efforts their first real job. Skid is a big hit and the girl is his inspiration and guiding star, without her he is lost. His big opportunity comes when a New York producer offers him a job in a Broadway production. He is satisfied to stay in burlesque, but the girl, whom he has married now, urges him to go. He is an instantaneous success, but the success now goes to his head and he forgets his wife, the girl who made it all possible. She is pursued by a wealthy and honorable gentleman who wants to marry her, but she forsakes it all to go back to Skid and save him from the rut into which he has fallen.

The production is lavishly staged and the "Follies" sequences are in natural colors. Over 80 girls appear on a huge stage setting in this sequence. A chorus whose average weight is over 180 pounds appears as the "beef trust" chorus in the burlesque shots. The production is truly an actual portrayal of the life of a trouper.

Selected short subjects, the M-G-M-International News, the Fox Movietone News and the Columbia Orchestra, under the direction of Claude Burrows, complete the program.

Pass the Quinine.

Word from the Belgian Congo, where Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's traveling picture unit is filming "Trader Horn," states that Edwina Booth, who has the feminine lead in this production, has completely recovered from an attack of jungle fever, which incapacitated her for two weeks. Harry Carey and Duncan Rinaldo, who have the two chief male roles in this film, both had a touch of Congo fever, which resembles a light attack of malaria, but Director W. S. Van Dyke has so far been exempt from any illness.

A GRIPPING TRIAL FILM SCORES HIT

A murder trial, courtroom picture that is described as different and refreshingly new in story and treatment, "The Drake Case," is the current feature at the Rialto. It is an all-talking screen production featuring a notable cast, including Gladys Brockwell, Forrest Stanley, Robert Frazer, Barbara Leonard, James Crane and other prominent players.

The entire story is practically enacted through the testimony of the witnesses, and is handled in such a manner that the audience in the theater becomes the audience in the courtroom listening to a trial marked with drama, tears, laughter, thrills and suspense. It has everything that features the trial of a celebrated murder case.

The story of "The Drake Case" concerns a woman charged with murder on almost irrefutable grounds who refuses to say a word in her own defense although she protests her innocence and in the same breath says she is glad that the murder victim is slain. Lulu Marks, a servant in the house of the murdered Mrs. George Morgan Drake, is arrested at the scene of the crime. A motive for the murder is established and all the evidence, including fingerprints, point to the Marks woman as the slayer, but she maintains her strange silence. This attitude throws a burden upon her lawyer and his method of extricating her and himself from a seemingly impossible position is the surprise and thrill of the picture.

Gladys Brockwell has the role of the accused woman with Forrest Stanley as the district attorney and Robert Frazer as the defense lawyer. An immense courtroom was built especially for the picture.

Gladys Brockwell is not here to bask in the limelight of stardom. A short few weeks after work was completed on "The Drake Case," Miss Brockwell met with a serious accident while driving home from a late preview of a picture, and she never recovered from the injury she received.

Gladys Brockwell has departed this world, but her beauty and talent will remain, and it will be some time before another will be able to give the talking screen so great a characterization as the one she gave while a member of the cast in "The Drake Case"—it was Miss Brockwell's last case and her greatest.

The program is rounded out with newsreel and short-reel sound features.

NOTABLE CAST REUNITED FOR FINE PICTURE

Claudette Colbert, slender, brown-eyed beauty of stellar fame in a number of Broadway productions, and Walter Huston, one of the outstanding stars of the legitimate stage in the past five years of Broadway theatrical history, are reunited in leading roles in the Paramount all-talking film success, "The Lady Lies," this week's featured screen attraction at the Earle Theater.

In this production Huston is the handsome widower and Miss Colbert is the woman unwittingly responsible for his social downfall.

Charles Ruggles, famed as one of the leading juvenile and elderly gentlemen comics of "the great white way," plays the comedy relief role in "The Lady Lies." His philosophy of women will give you the kick of your life. He was first seen and heard in talking pictures in "Gentlemen of the Press," Paramount's renowned play of newspaper life, based on the stage success by Ward Morehouse. Huston also made his debut in talking films in the Morehouse opus, as Wick Snell, the inveterate inhabitant of city rooms. Ruggles was the inebriated reporter who never seemed to know which paper he was working for.

"The Lady Lies" was written as a stage play by John Meehan, who served as the director of dialogue in the all-talking version. He has had years of experience as a stage director, notably with George M. Cohan.

Her third moving picture was the most interesting one for Claudette Colbert. All of her pictures have been made in the East. Her first picture was "Love o' Mike," filmed while she was busy every night and two afternoons a week on Broadway in her stage hit, "The Barker." It was a "tough" assignment, but she put all her energy into it and kept both jobs running smoothly.

Her next picture was Paramount's all-talking melodrama, "The Hole in the Wall," which was filmed while she was working on the stage as star of "Tin Pan Alley." It meant a lot of earnest work.

She plunged into the task of leading woman in Eugene O'Neill's Theater Guild play, "Dynamo," incidentally winning laurels by her performance. She didn't essay any film work during the run of "Dynamo."

When the play closed she was back to work again at the Paramount Long Island studios. The new opus was "The Lady Lies." This time she was working in a movie without any contemporary stage obligations.

Director Hobart Henley said afterward that the best performance of her career is the characterization of Joyce Roamer in this great all-talking romance.

MISS EAGELS IN A MODERN FRENCH PLAY

Jeanne Eagels in the role of a beautiful Parisienne in a sophisticated French picture adapted from the stage success by Louis Verneuill, "Jealousy," is the screen attraction current at Loew's Palace Theater. Fredric March plays opposite Miss Eagels.

The story is of a woman whose past threatens to destroy her present happiness. She has been the mistress of an elderly financier who has backed the opening of her fashionable shop in Paris. Then she marries a young artist and tries to convince him that the elderly lover has acted simply as her guardian. Finally the young man goes to the financier's home one night and kills him in a fit of jealousy, little realizing that his wife is concealed there, bargaining for her freedom.

On the stage Al Evans, the "prince of good fellows," and the Palace Syncopators are presented in C. A. Niggemeyer's latest production, replete with gorgeous settings and catchy music, "Romance Isle." An all-star cast is headed by the Hickey brothers, comedians; Eileen and Marjorie, tumblers; Kay and Sayres, dancers; Sylvia Field, formerly of Major Bowes' Capitol family of radio entertainers, and the Gamby-Hale Ballet.

The Fox Movietone News, the M-G-M International News, short subjects of unusual merit, Charles Gaige at the organ and the Palace Orchestra, under Harry Borjes, complete the program.

A VARIED BILL AT THE LITTLE

"The Constant Nymph," Margaret Kennedy's best selling novel adapted to the screen, is the current attraction at the Little Theater.

It is the story of the Bohemian family of Sangers and their odd friends, and was filmed in the actual locations, London, the Austrian Tyrol and in Brussels. Mabel Poulton, erstwhile stenographer and newcomer to the screen, plays Tessa, the tragic heroine of the story, and Ivor Novello, popular English actor, is seen in the role of Lewis Dodd, eccentric composer and disciple of the famous Sanger.

Robert Florey's famous "Suicide of a Hollywood Extra," the film that cost only $97 to make, is also on the bill. Cardboard, ink, paste and a pair of shears were used to make the modernistic effects and at the same time keep production costs down.

The program ends with a UFA oddity, "The Jewels of Venus," and Laurel and Hardy in "Two Tars."

FIRST M'CORMACK ALL-TALKIE GETS UNDER WAY ON OULD SOD

WITH the arrival of Frank Borzage, Fox film director, in Ireland, the actual work of filming the moving picture which will introduce John McCormack, the world famous tenor, to the screen audiences of the world has gotten under way.

The preliminary production plans were completed with every aid extended by both the officials and the public of Ireland. There has been a great interest shown everywhere since the arrival of the vanguard several weeks ago, all of Ireland realizing the importance of the first recording of John McCormack's voice for the enjoyment of the present-day audiences and posterity. The picture will also be the first all-talking and all-singing picture made on Irish soil.

Mr. McCormack is very enthusiastic about the production. He has made certain suggestions for the story, written by Tom Barry and taken over early in the summer by J. M. Kerrigan. As yet there has been no title suggested for the picture.

Mr. Kerrigan, well known on Broadway for his many famous characterizations, was formerly one of the stage directors of the famous Abbey Theater in Dublin.

Mr. Kerrigan is an authority on Irish literature and folk lore. He has assembled for Mr. Borzage a group of players from which the actors will be selected for the cast supporting Mr. McCormack. Mr. Power O'Malley, one of the Irish landscape painters, is assisting in the work of selecting suitable locations for the taking of the exterior scenes. Most of these locations will be in the southern counties. Two big estates have been offered the Fox organization and some of the early scenes will be made on the estate of Mr. McCormack, Moore Abbey, about 30 miles from Dublin. Through Mr. Kerrigan's local connections, the productions unit has received special police and government privileges.

The Fox Movietone technical staff, under the direction of Harry Brand, already is on the ground.

An Irish village near Moore Abbey has been selected for the first exterior shots. Borzage and the famous tenor have found their ideas as to the story in accord. At their second conference McCormack approved the script, paving the way for rapid progress on the film. Screen tests for native Irish types have been held day and night with the result that the cast virtually is complete.

FOX THEATER OBSERVES AN ANNIVERSARY

A Fox Movietone all-talking picture, "Salute," played against the romantic backgrounds of Annapolis and West Point, is now at the Fox Theater. It was directed by John Ford, and it is packed with drama and thrills.

The story is by one of America's most popular authors, Tristram Tupper, and John Stone, expert writer for the audible screen. Two months were spent filming action on the original locations. The cast obviously was hand-picked. The picture's climax reaches its height in an Army-Navy football classic at the Polo Grounds, New York City.

Heading the cast are George O'Brien, of "Sunrise" and "Noah's Ark" fame, and Helen Chandler, widely known Broadway actress. In support are William Janney, Joyce Compton, Stepin Fetchit, negro comedian; Frank Albertson and other favorites.

"Salute" is a gripping, sincere drama of two boys and two girls, told in a refreshingly different way. One boy, George O'Brien, is an athletic hero at West Point—an All-American half back. O'Brien's brother, William Janney, is a midshipman at Annapolis, a dreamer who neither understands nor is interested in his brother's get-what-you-go-after attitude.

When the girl the dreamy youth loves is about to be swept away from him by his famous kinsman, he rises in revolt and things begin to happen.

Miss Chandler's part in "Salute" is her first since Fox Films signed her to a long-term contract following completion of her role in the Broadway production, "The Marriage Bed."

Janney is expected to establish himself in immediate favor with his work as the young midshipman who triumphs over his inferiority complex as well as over great physical odds. Janney also was graduated to the speaking screen from the stage.

O'Brien should be ideal as the West Point gridiron hero whose joy in his younger brother's victories on the football field and in love overshadows the bitterness of his own defeats.

Director Ford apparently has scored what Hollywood critics regard as an unusual triumph in the staging of the football sequences. The first battle of its kind made with dialogue and all the sounds attendant upon a huge pigskin classic should afford rich material for the man who made "Four Sons." These scenes are really a quarter back's view of the big game.

The stage program of the theater's second anniversary program will be the second Fanchon and Marco "idea," "Fantasma," which features two well-known comedians, Barto and Mann, and a long list of Hollywood stars. Featured also are the Sunkist Beauties and the theater's own master of ceremonies, John Irving Fisher.

The overture selected for the Fox Grand Orchestra by its conductor, Leon Brusiloff, is the same as utilized for the opening two years ago, Victor Herbert's "American Fantasie."

Fox Movietone News will have its usual interesting collection of news events in sound and picture, while several subsidiary features commemorating the "birthday party" will round out the program.

A Big Splash.

"Isle of Escape," starring Monte Blue and Myrna Loy, will have in its supporting cast Duke Kahanamoku, swimming champion of the world.

COLOR, MUSIC, LAUGHTER, FUN IN WOW FARCE

Winnie Lightner is evidently destined to be always a tomboy. For the stellar musical comedy and variety stage star, who made her first stage appearance as a tomboy, and then capitalized on this odd character as a headliner, enacts a tomboy role as one of the nugget gathering chorus girls in "Gold Diggers of Broadway," Warner Bros. Vitaphone 100 per cent natural color, singing, talking and dancing picture in Technicolor, now at the Metropolitan Theater.

Miss Lightner was born in Greenpoint, N. Y., and educated in the public schools of New York City. She made her professional debut on the stage of Shea's Buffalo Theater in 1919, singing and dancing in a single act arranged by herself. Now she is to be seen in the most amazing and gorgeous of all natural color films, "Gold Diggers of Broadway," produced by Warner Bros. from David Belasco's production of Avery Hopwood's greatest stage success.

The color process used is Technicolor in its newest development, the same that Warner Bros. used in "On With the Show." The many colors and tints are thrown upon the screen with absolute fidelity to nature, and when it comes to the chorus numbers in the show-within-a-show scenes the riot of colors is absolutely gorgeous.

The story lives up to the treatment accorded it. As "The Gold Diggers" in its stage presentation, it scored one of the biggest hits of David Belasco's long life as a theatrical producer. As a motion picture, entirely in color, it will have a success immeasureably greater than its stage success.

The cast is one of the starriest that any producing firm has ever given us. The leading roles are entrusted to Nancy Welford and Conway Tearle, with other principal parts in the experienced and capable hands of such notable artists as Ann Pennington, Lilyan Tashman, Albert Gran, Gertrude Short, Nick Lucas, the radio and phonograph star; William Bakewell, Helen Foster, Neely Edwards, Julia Swayne Gordon, Lee Moran and Armand Kalis.

Nancy Welford plays the part of Jerry, a chorus girl, and Conway Tearle that of Stephen Lee. Lee's ward, Wally, has fallen in love with Violet, another member of the chorus, and Lee comes to put an end to his infatuation. The love affairs are straightened out only after such an evening of laughter as only Avery Hopwood could provide.

Nine songs were writtan for "Gold Diggers of Broadway" by Al Dubin and Joe Burke and are sung by Nick Lucas, one of the most popular radio and phonograph stars of the day, and by Miss Welford, Miss Lightner and Miss Pennington (although the latter shines as the dancing star). "Painting the Clouds With Sunshine" and "Tip Toe Through the Tulips" are the theme songs, and you are certain to be hearing them played and sung for many months to come. Other songs that are highly appreciated by the audience are "Go to Bed," "What Will I Do Without You?" "In a Kitchenette," "Keeping the Wolf From the Door," "Mechanical Man," "And Still They Fall in Love," "Song of the Gold Diggers," sung by Miss Pennington and the chorus ensemble, and "The Poison Kiss of That Spaniard."

Stage Presentations of Interest

FOOTLIGHTS AND SHADOWS

By JOHN J. DALY

WHAT amounts to an event in Washington, and in the theater, is the arrival here today of no less a personage than Ring Lardner.

Now Ring Lardner, when he comes to Washington, usually does so for comedy relief. That is, he has done this in the past. For some reason or other, Mr. Lardner has a soft spot in his heart for Washington. Whenever he felt himself fed up with the writing of short stories, whenever he wanted to get away from the hum-drum of life as he never lives it in Great Neck, L. I., or in the more peaceful valleys of New York City itself, he hops on what he likes to call a rattler and comes to Washington. On those occasions he makes the Press Club his headquarters. There, every night, until the pink dawn, he hob-nobs with the youthful scribes and pharisees, and there is a great deal of profound thought and wisdom spilled in the smoking room. A humorist, Mr. Lardner likes to get away from the lighter vein—and so he becomes, on his regular visits to Washington, a sort of philosopher. As the young men of the profession like to know how the older gentry got that way, Mr. Lardner always has worshippers at his shrine.

Many a good time the cubs of Washington journalism have had with that old bear, Ring Lardner. Generous of heart, he has dispensed of his time and talents in making for the boys nights never to be forgotten. Now, on the occasion of this visit, Mr. Lardner comes as a playwright. So, undoubtedly, there will be little time for the usual nocturnal gatherings, a playwright being a pretty busy man at the time of his play's opening. However, if all the newspapermen who count Ring Lardner their friend are present on the opening night—which happens to be tomorrow—'twill be a pretty sight.

That everything should be according to Hoyle, and that Washington should be represented in this play, even in an off-hand way, Mr. Lardner has chosen as his collaborator one George S. Kaufman, referred to by the humorist as "Pink Toes" Kaufman. By this time it must be generally known that George Kaufman is one of the well-established dramatists of the American theater. On his own hook and in teamwork with Marc Connelly, Mr. Kaufman has carved five or six immortal pieces for the theater. There was a time, however, when Washington was his workshop and when his literary efforts were confined to a column in a local newspaper. So George Kaufman, too, is by way of having a following in Washington. When a man has a following in Washington he may be said to have a following. Men have followings in New York. That is true; but the New York followings are not quite like the Washington followings.

Because he is coming to town with a new play, and because so many of his fellow scribes are interested in the working methods of Ring Lardner, the coauthor of "June Moon" was asked to scribble off a few lines on "The Art of Playwriting." Although he usually gets paid for what he writes, Mr. Lardner consented to let this particular contribution be charged to "Profit and Loss," an old-established firm along the Potomac. It might be thought, by some who failed to see Mr. Lardner's other dramatic works, that "June Moon" is his first attempt to crash the footlights. Not so. He has authored at least one play, and helped on others. So, he speaks with some degree of authority. Says he:

To me, as to every one else, I imagine, there has always been something glamorous about the stage. Even now, at my age, I can recall saying to my nurse, when I was a baby, "Mrs. Kendall, to me there is something glamorous about the stage." I couldn't say glamorous any more than I could pronounce her name, which was Cooper.

Her inevitable reply was a rebuke and an attempt to change the subject: "Young massa he do ol' Coopah de goodness to keep his mind offum such 'tropics' an' 'vote hiss't to not bitin' him daddy's laigs."

Poor old Kendall, her advice went in one ear and came out the other side, shattering the temporal bone and lodging in the commode. She was evidently above medium height or had stood on a blotter.

At any rate, the lure of the theater clung to me through the years and induced me last winter to suggest to Mr. George ("Pink Toes") Kaufman that he collaborate in writing a play in which no lines would be spoken or even hinted at. The leading character (in my story) was a man employed in a drug store; in a word, a druggist's assistant.

In the first act, a middle-aged woman enters the store. She wants a bottle of hamamelis. This would have to be brought out in gestures, perhaps a shrug of the shoulder. She is unable to see the druggist's assistant, who is in the back of the store behind a large piece of furniture with shelves, on which are all kinds of bottles containing medicines (it doesn't have to be really medicines).

She waits ten minutes. Then another woman comes into the store, slapping her knee in token that she has fallen off a horse. The two women wait fifteen more minutes. A man (probably the type of Vice President Curtis) enters. He shows by facial contortions that his niece has sent him for some aspirin. The three potential customers stand first on one foot, then on the other; occasionally on one another's feet through oversight. This is for comedy relief.

In the second act, two more people join the first three, and the final act finds eleven people in the store, and they show by dance steps that they would now take even an expensive bottle of perfume if they could get any one to wait on them. The druggist's assistant never appears and the mystery of what he has been doing in the back of the store would make talk long after the audience got home.

From this rough scenario Mr. Harris and Mr. Kaufman have evolved "June Moon." The idea is almost the same, excepting that some of the characters have lines to say, but a cast has been chosen that speaks these lines so that they do not convey any meaning. An outstanding member of the cast is Mr. Harry Rosenthal, the zitherist, who is reported to be the man whom Gyp the Blood and his boy scouts were really after that night.

In the two rehearsals of "June Moon," which the men who have taken it over permitted me to attend, performers, stage hands, directors and producers all behaved like a happy family, or as a happy family is supposed to behave. Personally, I have been brought up in and met many families and never yet ran across one that was happy. There is always at least one member about as low and miserable as a person can get, and no wonder.

* * * *

WELL, that's Mr. Larnder's version of it, offered here for what it's worth. From other and perhaps less authoritative quarters it is learned that he and George Kaufman have turned their pens to a subject that has needed treatment for, lo, these many years—as the saying goes. They have taken up the song writing business.

While all this hilarity is taking place within the halls of the Belasco Theater, the sister house, Poli's, goes in for serious drama. The week there offers Katherine Cornell in "The Age of Innocence."

The title of this play is familiar to book lovers, since it is a dramatization by Margaret Ayer Barnes of Edith Wharton's novel.

The contrast between the social New York of the seventies and that of the nineteen-twenties is the gist of the story. Mrs. Wharton is an analyst and psychologist and also an artist in characterization, some extremely well-drawn portraits appearing in this drama.

Family, represented by a few of "the best" as a basis of the social pyramid, presented an unyielding front to the abashed climber. Taste, good form and family were shibboleths, the latter jealously guarding family reputation. Mrs. Wharton's characters are types.

PERHAPS less known than some of the old-time producers, Lew Leslie, whose musical revue, "Blackbirds," comes to the National Theater tonight is thoroughly grounded in stagecraft, having been a component part of the theater for 25 years as actor, manager, director and producer. While known to the inner circle of the theater world, the outside public did not recognize the name of Lew Leslie till his present production of "Blackbirds."

Lew Leslie, with his complete knowledge of theater value, readily recognized the yet unmarketed talent of Dorothy Fields and Jimmy McHugh, whom he engaged to write the lyrics and music for his "Blackbirds," thus establishing them for the first time in the legitimate theater. Miss Fields is the daughter of W. C. Fields.

MISS CORNELL IN NOTED PLAY ALL THIS WEEK

Katharine Cornell in "The Age of Innocence" will be presented by Gilbert Miller in this success of last season in New York at Poli's Theater, beginning tomorrow evening.

"The Age of Innocence" is a dramatization of Edith Wharton's novel of the same name by Margaret Ayer Barnes. The story is of New York society in the early seventies, when Forty-second street was almost out of town and people drove in victorias, one-horse coupes and hansoms; when the society of the best was restricted in numbers, an aristocracy of blood and breeding, that was ever alert against the encroachment of the new aristocracy of wealth.

For the purpose of the story there are two young women of widely divergent and strongly contrasting personalities, and one man in love alternately with both women and loved by them. Every motive, every mood, the state of mind of these characters, is ruthlessly exposed in the keen analytical manner which is one of the distinguishing gifts of Mrs. Wharton.

Ellen, Countess Olenska, is the disturbing element. She is an American girl, long time a resident of Europe, who has fled from her brutal husband in Poland under circumstances of a somewhat compromising nature.

By virtue of her influential family connections, she succeeds in reentering New York society, which accepts her, albeit reluctantly and disapprovingly. She has lived too long abroad in an atmosphere of artistic freedom to endure patiently the artificial standards, the suppression of natural instincts and emotions of Puritan New York. Hence there is presented a contrast between European and American standards.

Newland Archer is the man who finds himself in the dilemma of being engaged to May van der Luyden, absolutely conventional daughter of the most conventional of families, and discovering he is being led away by every tie of mutual taste and interest toward Ellen.

Archer's position becomes most unenviable. In his profession, the law, he is called on to decide whether Ellen shall seek a divorce and so start anew a scandal fast dying out, or whether she shall seek a reconciliation with her husband in the interests of her family's social status. A divorce means that Ellen will be free to marry Archer, but opposed to this step is the accumulated weight of family hostility to divorce proceedings.

It is in the role of the countess that Miss Cornell will have full sway. Her gowns of the period were designed by Georges Barbier, of Paris, and executed by Worth, of Paris.

Leading in the large cast of eighteen is Arnold Korff, and among others having prominent roles are John Marston, Susan Blake, Isabel Irving, Katharine Stewart, Giannina Gatti, Ian Wolfe, Albert Tavernier, Edouard La Roche and Henry Richards.

The production was staged by Guthrie McClintic.

Chesapeake Beach.

With fishing now the best this season, Chesapeake Beach is catering to large numbers of anglers. Trout, spots, bluefish, rock and hardheads are being caught. Stores, hotels, cafes and boathouses remain open for the convenience of sportsmen. Today the Potomac Anglers Association will hold its annual outing at the resort.

Played With Sarah.

Miss Jean Dixon, who plays the role of Lucille in the new Ring Lardner-George S. Kaufman play, "June Moon," the attraction at the Belasco Theater this week, received her theatrical training under Sarah Bernhardt and played her first part with her in "La Samaritaine" in Paris.

Symphony Orchestra.

Henri Verbrugghen, Belgian conductor, will be heard in Washington this winter. He will conduct the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra in a concert to be given on February 13 at Constitution Hall, under the management of T. Arthur Smith.

"BLACKBIRDS" BEGINS ITS RUN AT NATIONAL

Beginning tonight, the much exploited all-colored musical revue "Blackbirds" will begin a special one week engagement at the National Theater, with the usual Wednesday and Saturday matinees.

Lew Leslie's "Blackbirds" was the smash musical hit of the late Broadway season, where it played to capacity audiences for fifteen successive months at the Eltinge Theater, and it will be presented here in its entirety for one week only, previous to going to Chicago for an indefinite run.

While Dorothy Fields and Jimmy McHugh have received many encomiums for their snappy lyrics and delightful musical score, the chief credit goes unquestionably to Lew Leslie, the producer, who has established himself as supreme in this line of stage entertainment and who is really responsible for many of the credits that are given to others. It was his vision and initiative that brought together the unusually clever cast of comedians, singers and dancers and incorporated the several novelty features, some of which include the Plantation Orchestra, which is augumented with several local musicians, making an instrumental ensemble of twenty in the orchestra pit; the fast-stepping chorus of Creole beauties and the Cecil Mack Choir, whose rendition of the travesty on "Porgy" at the end of the first act is one of the high lights of the performance.

Harriett Calloway heads the cast which includes Beebee Joyner, Clarence Foster, Worthy and Thompson, Sandy Burns, Henry "Gang" Jines, Derby Wilson, Hilda Perlano, Rollin Smith, Lloyd Mitchell, Roy White and a number of other entertainers.

Another Premiere.

Arch Selwyn, who has formed an alliance with Charles B. Cochran, noted London producer, to present a series of plays from the English stage in America each theatrical season, will bring one of these to Washington prior to the Broadway premiere. This is "The Middle Watch," described as a romance of the navy, now one of the most successful farces on the London stage. It is expected that "The Middle Watch" will open for a week's engagement in Washington on October 7. It was written by Ian Hay and Stephen King-Hall.

RING LARDNER CO-AUTHOR OF A NEW COMEDY

"June Moon," a new play, by Ring Lardner and George S. Kaufman, will be the attraction at the Belasco Theater this week. The first performance will be given tomorrow night.

"June Moon" glorifies the song-writing profession as well as the composers and lyric writer, who yearly wring hearts with tearful ballads. What Mr. Lardner did for ball players in his play, "Elmer the Great," and Mr. Kaufman did for actors in "The Royal Family," both gentlemen have done for song writers in "June Moon."

Sam H. Harris has assembled a cast of distinction for "June Moon." It includes Norman Foster, Lindo Watkins, Lee Patrick, Jean Dixon, Harry Rosenthal, Frank Conlon, Leo Kennedy, Florence D. Rice, Philip Loeb, Emil Hoch and Margaret Lee.

Harry Rosenthal, who has appeared many times in Washington with his orchestra, will play his first stage role in "June Moon." He appears in the play as Maxie, a wise-cracking song arranger, who tries out the various songs submitted to his song-publishing firm. Some of the songs are good; some of them not so good. Good and bad, all of the ballads were composed by Ring Lardner. They are guaranteed by the author to bring tears to your eyes.

His First Role.

Rehearsals of "June Moon," the new comedy of Ring Lardner and George S. Kaufman, were held up in New York last week because Harry Rosenthal, the orchestra leader and composer, was invited by Henry Ford to come to Detroit to play for him. Mr. Rosenthal is playing his first stage role in "June Moon," which opens at the Belasco Theater Tomorrow.

PLAYWRITING NO LARK FOR A CRAFTSMAN

Eugene O'Neill's play "Marco Millions," which will be presented by the New York Theater Guild at the National Theater, October 7, illustrates strikingly how playwrighting is no lark in the case of a careful craftsman. Even composing a play wherein historical personages are treated figuratively is no flight of fancy. It entails a great deal of concentrated study, of grubbing through musty tomes and O'Neill has obviously done this before feeling sufficiently prepared for his symbolic treatment of the great traveler of Venice.

Dramaturgy, even in the picnic ground of Bermuda, where "Marco Millions" was written, is no gay gamble when you consider that Sir Henry Yule's edition of Marco Polo's travel tales, the main source of O'Neill's inspiration, is in two ponderous volumes, running to more than 1,000 pages.

Polo's own account of his adventures, and the marvels encountered, which he dictated to a fellow prisoner, Rusticiano of Pisa, while captive at Genoa, are heavy and solemn reading, for some of the dullness of prison life has filtered into them. The introductory chapters, dealing with the wanderings of Marco Polo and his father and his uncle, are fairly brisk, but too curtailed; the middle section, dealing with the customs and the cities of the Chinese, is vivid and diverting but the last part is a hollow and monotonous recital of various Mongolian battles, as arid as Julius Ceasar's Commentaries sometimes become.

Through all this weighty recital the author of "Marco Millions" had to rummage. In addition he had to plough through the annotations of various commentators included in the two volumes. And, as if this weren't enough, each page is hedged in by a thick barbed wire of footnotes, closely printed and earnestly spilling from one page to the next.

Any one who finished rustling through this monumental collection of authorities has at his command a vast store of Asiatic erudition of every imaginable kind—if he isn't stunned by it.

The fact that O'Neill actually digested all this mass is strikingly borne out by "Marco Millions." It is best attested by the footnotes, those thorny appendages which are skipped by the average reader. As an instance of how thoroughly the playwright foraged through this honeycomb of surrounding text for errant honey to sweeten his story, consider his casual stage direction about the appearance of Ghazan Khan, the young Prince of Persia who takes the Chinese Princess Kukachin off Marco Polo's hands.

O'Neill writes: "Ghazan is a young man, not handsome but noble and manly looking:" That is clear evidence that O'Neill's eye had caught an obscure note in Yule's edition which said that Ghazan's appearance was quite the opposite of that of his handsome father, but that he made up for that by being temperate, just and capable.

As another example of O'Neill's industry in scanning bristling footnotes, consider the relationship of granddaughter of the great Khan, which he gives to the Princess Kukuchin. Marco Polo's own narrative contains no suggestion of her being related to the emperor, but tucked elusively at the very bottom of a formidable footnote is a line to the effect that there was another Kukuchin besides the one mentioned by Polo, and that this other girl with the same name was the wife of the great Khan's son. That was sufficient inkling to give O'Neill the idea of turning his princess into the emperor's granddaughter.

Consider also that Marco Polo never speaks in his book of having been a commission agent for the Emperor Kublai of China. Yet a lurking reference in Yule's book says unobtrusively that a French student of Marco named G. Pauthier discovered in ancient Chinese annals a statement that one Polo was in 1277 made a commission agent of the second class for the imperial council. Which was sufficient acorn to sprout into a comedy scene in "Marco Millions."

Another fragment of erudition which bobs up in the play is in connection with O'Neill's spelling of Kublai's title, in the peculair form of "Kaan." A tiny item reveals that the common but improper orthography for the Chinese ruler's title is "Khan," but that this name of "Lord" applied only to lesser dignitaries in Kublai's day. His proper embellishment was Kaan, apparently a contraction of Khakah, meaning "Lord of Lords." And O'Neill observed that.

Again the description of the princess' funeral carriage in the play has no counterpart in Polo's book. But it indicates that O'Neill had threaded his way through a note describing the huge carts bearing large Tartar tents and drawn by a swarm of oxen and his imagination fired to substitute men for the oxen.

Another illustration of how well O'Neill absorbed the minute detail of the glossaries occurs in connection with Polo's explanation of the siege machine which he and his father and his uncle invented for the Emperor Kublai's armies. Polo labels it a mangonel, a form of vast sling well known in his day in Europe, and hurling enormous stones at an invested city.

But O'Neill had scooped up a passing reference to Polo as the man traditionally believed to introduce gunpowder into Europe. And that was a cue for him to transform Polo's mangonel into a cannon discharging shot and to build up a scene in which the young self-made man of Venice, Peking and parts intervening makes the Mongol emperor acquainted with the application of Chinese gunpowder to artillery.

ATTRACTIONS ON THE WAY

Mark Twain's famous story, "A Connecticut Yankee," adapted and furnished with a musical comedy equipment by Herbert Fields, Richard Rodgers and Lorenz Hart, which was one of last season's most enjoyable presentations in this city, will return for an engagement of one week commencing Sunday evening, September 29, at the National Theater.

This company has just finished a six weeks' engagement in Detroit and a previous stay in Chicago of five months.

Mark Twain wrote "A Connecticut Yankee," first, to make the world laugh and, second, to "show up" King Arthur. It is a purely American classic. It has been translated faithfully by Fields, Rodgers and Hart, and all the rollicking humor of the book has been heightened by the interpolation of wisecracks and latter day sayings.

The cast is a big winner. Richard Lane is the Yankee; Mary Adams, the lovely maid; Paul Everton, the King Arthur; Nana Bryant, the wicked queen, and George E. Mack, the droll Merlin. Wonderful, indeed, is the dancing of Mary Adams, who wins her audience by her sweet ways and the perfection of her art.

Hadley Waters, who play, "The Ghost Parade," opens at Poli's Theater Sunday night September 29, is not only a playwright but an excellent salesman. Such a combination of talent is unusual.

No sooner had he finished his successful "Little Orchid Annie," which was such a great hit in California, when he started work on "The Ghost Parade." He told the story of the play to Charlie Gordon, who had produced last season's successful "Jarnegan," and within twenty minutes Gordon had given Waters an advance royalty check.

Charles K. Gordon has surrounded "The Ghost Parade" with a brilliant English and American cast, including Clarence Derwent, Nestor de Becker, Frank Hearn, Joan Blaine, Ann Johnson, Evan Thompson, Furguson Reddie and Stuart Casey.

On Monday, September 30, William Faversham will open a week's engagement at the Belasco in a new play, "Her Friend the King," by A. E. Thomas and Harrison Rhodes. L. Lawrence Weber, the producer, has surrounded Mr. Faversham with an excellent company, including Ara Gesald, Katherine Kohler, Hugh Sinclair and Daisy Atherton.

The play is labeled a modern comedy; its mood is in the lighter vein and concerns an overthrown ruler of a small European duchy and an American widow who spends lavishly to restore the throne to the king.

Mr. Faversham's recent appearances in Washington were in the leading roles of George Tyler's all-star revivals of "Jim, the Penman" and "Diplomacy."

The return of "Burlesque Review" to the Gayety Theater next week is awaited with keenest joy, due to the reputation it has always enjoyed; a reputation such as any burlesque show might be proud of. It comes with a company of funmakers, singers and dancers that may be relied upon to do full justice to all the requirements for a bang-up burlesque show. Much stress is laid upon two most elaborately staged scenes, an "American Rookie in France" and "The Play's the Thing," both of which exemplify the very funniest side of burlesque entertainment. Harry "Pep" Pearce and Madlyn Beatty are the featured players, supported by a strong cast of principals, and a chorus that is an eye-filler.

ECHOES OF THE N. Y. STAGE

By ROBERT BELL

FRAGMENTS, fragments, fragments! Held together by little threads, woven into patterns that fall apart and disintegrate at a touch, becoming fragments again—it seems to me that is life as Anton Tchekov sees it. Every one is wrapped up in his own personality, his own aspirations and dreams, his own conceit. Love of man and maid is no remedy; mother love, even, is no escape; fame and all it brings, though it attain the heights, can not weld the fragmentary existence into a whole. A philosophy that sounds morbid, that is discouraging, but one which, while in the grip of a Tchekov play, seems undeniable, because with bitter irony is an understanding and love for each and every fragment—a manly pity.

The Civic Repertory Company, under the direction of Eva Le Gallienne, started its fourth year last night with Tchekov, "The Sea Gull." It will be remembered this is an early work of Tchekov; that its first performances were failures, yet that in time it became the most popular of all the Moscow Art Theater productions, the most beloved by them and the emblem of that organization, and it was a sea gull with uplifted wings that became the motto placed on every program, on every circular, on the very curtain of every stage on which they played. It is not necessary to say to what corners of the earth the bird has flown.

Miss La Gallienne has proved several times since she first startled blase New York with her superb production of "Three Sisters," that her company is well able to understand and interpret the intense and solemn mood of Tchekov, and last night was no exception, for the fine, true undercurrent was steadily there, the pictures changing and melting and growing, one into another, with added beauty as the play progressed. What they lacked last night, what the Russians have with their thoughtful melancholy, what in a different form of art is exemplified by Chaliapin, is vitality. There is a gusto about Tchekov which the actors last night did not catch. Consequently the performance was keyed too low and pauses and long silences crept in to mar, in my opinion, the onward sweep of the drama.

Jacob Ben-Ami, as the novelist who has everything in the world but happiness (the play's most tragic figure), proved himself again one of the great actors of our theater. Nazimova, who was with the organization last year, is badly missed, but even so, Ben-Ami is a gain, for his long years of apprenticeship with the Jewish Art Theater, before he learned to speak our language, has given him a comprehension of the ideals of repertory which few possess. Josephine Hutchinson, who loves the artist, played the wounded sea gull of the title. Her early scenes are on one note, but as the child developed into a woman and learned to know herself, in the great emotional scene of the last act, she was so excellent, so true, so appealing that at her exit the audience forgot to applaud keeping their personal ovation for her until she came alone before the curtain when the play was over.

Miss Le Gallienne, in a small role, did, I must state, her usual posing, which is a danger not only to her but to her company. The one adverse criticism which can be made of this organization is that its members are becoming too self-indulgent so that we are beginning to catalogue them in regard to their mannerisms—a danger repertory always presents—so that we begin to watch and listen to the actors rather than to the characters they represent. Because I consider the civic repertory with the Theater Guild (and many will with some right object to my including the Guild) the only truly important, and because "The Sea Gull" was probably the most beautiful production given any play this season by a theatrical organization in this country, I speak with the utmost and sincerest feeling. Walter Beck, many Washingtonians will be glad to know, gave a performance of great charm and quiet mellowness.

To say that "Houseparty," by Kenneth Phillips Britton and Roy Hargrave, lacks much in comparison with "The Sea Gull" would be absolutely absurd were it not that this little comedy of college life by two young Williams' men aims at much more than the authors or the production achieve. The background is a house party in a fraternity at Williams College. A somewhat nurotic but popular boy accidentally kills a young woman of the street, and out of an innate fear conceals her in a cupboard. You have, then, the flippant talk and games and dancing of the young people, among which the boy with the terrible thought gnawing at his brain moves. The authors have attempted in "Houseparty" to get away from the usual "Good News" type of college play, but unlike Tchekov they have been unable to delve deeply into their characters, with the result that for all their intention the boys and girls of the play still have a musical comedy atmosphere.

Roy Hargrave plays the boy. He is always interesting, demanding our attention. He is one of the few actors I have seen who can throw himself into paroxysms without bringing a smile to his audiences. This he proved without reservation in the melodrama, "The Spider." What I liked most was how in "Houseparty" he played the quiet scenes in a downright honest manner, winning our sympathy at the start.

For Wells Hawks.

George Denham, superintendent of elephants for Ringling Bros., Barnum & Bailey Circus, has just sent a "bull hook" of old Jumbo, the famous elephant, to his friend, Wells Hawks, celebrated press agent of the theater and circus. Mr. Hawks is now at Pomona, N. Y.

Jumbo was with Barnum & Bailey Circus for years. At St. Thomas, Canada, in the summer of 1885, Jumbo was hurt and then died. Bull hooks were carried on many cars and one of these hooks was kept by Denham. About eighteen years ago, while with the Ringling Bros., Wells Hawks, as a press agent, went to St. Thomas, Canada. The elephants were unloaded from the train on a Sunday and taken to the grave of Jumbo, where they were led by a band from the circus. The members of the circus who knew and loved old Jumbo stood there as if they knew and understood. Who can say they didn't? asks Mr. Hawks, who believes elephants have marvelous memories. Those old elephants stood in solemn silence as the band played a hymn in honor of Jumbo.

Three Concerts.

T. Arthur Smith announces the usual series of three concerts by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30 on January 7, January 28 and March 4.

The famous orchestra which visits Washington annually has 85 consecutive years of musical history and tradition behind it.

Arturo Toscanini, Willem Mengelberg, and Bernardino Molinari will conduct one concert each.

Orchestra Series.

The Philadelphia Orchestra Association announces its usual series of four concerts in Washington, at the Constitution Hall, on Tuesday afternoons, November 5, December 10, January 21 and February 18.

The season brings to the conductor's stand Leopold Stokowski and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, each conducting two concerts.

This year marks the Philadelphia Orchestra's thirtieth season, the seventeenth under Mr. Stokowski.

In Ibsen Plays.

Although Linda Watkins will play a comedy role in "June Moon," when the new comedy by Ring Lardner and George S. Kaufman opens at the Belasco Theater tomorrow, she is by no means identified with comedy parts. Last season, for example, she was seen in New York in several Ibsen dramas, including "The Lady From the Sea."

Comedian's Daughter.

Dorothy Fields, who is responsible for the lyrics of "Blackbirds," coming to the National Theater, is the daughter of the well-known comedian-producer, Lew Fields. Miss Fields had a burning ambition to go on the stage and only her father's wish that she follow another branch of the theater has kept her from the footlights. She satisfied her histrionic desire by teaching dramatic art and by writing poetry for magazines. Then she met Jimmy McHugh, heard some of his lilting melodies and they found themselves in perfect accord for a successful song-writing team.

General Orders.

General Order No. 1 from Mr. I. H. Herk, general manager of Mutual Burlesque Association, to all theater and company managers gives a hint as to why Mutual Burlesque, which plays locally at the Gayety, is always such a hit. The order follows: "Watch every moment of every performance. Listen to your audiences. Move around the lobbies and foyers during intermissions and after performances, and hear the comments of your patrons. Send the results in detail to this office, accompanied by all newspaper criticisms."

Welcome, Winnie

Winnie Lightner, who practically stops the show in Warner Bros. all-Technicolor special, "Gold Diggers of Broadway," has reaped the benefits of a sensational first-screen performance. As a result of it, she has been given a leading role in another Warner Bros. all-singing, all-Technicolor special, "Hold Everything," which is now in production on the coast. Miss Lightner has scored one of the most decisive personal triumps achieved thus far in talking pictures. Coming to Warner Bros. from the vaudeville stage, she has proved the outstanding entertainer in "Gold Diggers of Broadway" and has recently completed a starring picture for the same organization, entitled "She Couldn't Say No."

TIP TOP SHOW AT THE GAYETY

Now and then one burlesque show is just a little better than another. Once in a while there comes along one that is so well fortified that it stands out boldly as an all-round good entertainment.

"Night Club Girls," if its last season's performance may be considered, was voted in the superior class. In consequence of this, the show has been kindly remembered ever since by burlesque fans, who are a bit difficult to satisfy, and who may see this show at the popular Gayety Theater this week. This latest concoction of fun, song and dance has been made even more inviting through the modern touch. The high tide of advanced ideas has given it a special atmosphere which took the courage of initiative to accomplish. The results obtained must be very gratifying to burlesque patrons. Special stress is laid upon having secured a thoroughly good company. Bobby Wilson and Jessie McDonald are the leaders of this hurricane of jollity. They are assisted by Ralph Smith, Walter Wayne, Fred Walker, Rae Allen, Jule Paulsen, Lillian Fernald and Ed Ryan (the dancing prodigy), and a chorus that is something more than a help in making the two biggest special features, "Telephone Scene" and the Rose number, extremely popular.

Stage and Screen Presentations

ANOTHER FAMOUS PLAY ACTED BY GROUP OF NOTED PLAYERS

"THREE Live Ghosts," with all of them talking, now follows "Bulldog Drummond" and "Alibi" in the United Artists group of talking pictures. The paradoxically flesh and blood phantoms in this 100 per cent dialogue picturization of Frederic Isham's play are Charles McNaughton, Claud Allister and Robert Montgomery. Beryl Mercer is the "Old Sweetheart" of the piece, and Joan Bennett is the Rose Gordon who paints china and hopes her sweetheart will somehow come through safely. Thornton Freeland, assistant director of "Alibi," made the picture. Max Marcin adapted the play and directed the dialogue recording.

It was Mr. Marcin, playwright turned producer, who offered "Three Live Ghosts" at the Greenwich Village Theater in New York on the night of September 29, 1920, with Beryl Mercer in the role of "Old Sweetheart," and Charles McNaughton in the character of Jimmie Gubbins, liveliest of all the ghosts. These players now complement their years of stage experience with ventures into the audible cinema.

Miss Mercer's best known stage portrayal was that of the lady herself in Barrie's "The Old Lady Shows Her Medals;" and she is following up her work in the Marcin picture with an audible film version of the Barrie play. Mr. McNaughton, the Bert of "The Better 'Ole," has made his film debut in a role that brought him considerable prominence on the stage.

"The honors and opportunities belong chiefly to Miss Mercer and Mr. McNaughton, both of whom are delightful from beginning to end," was the opinion of Alexander Woolcott, who criticized the play for the New York Times of September 30, 1920.

Claude Allister, the kleptomaniacal "Spoofy" of the piece, is identified to film patrons as Algy, who so persistently aided Ronald Colman in "Bulldog Drummond." He made his entry into films at the time he was appearing in the Los Angeles stage production of "The Play's the Thing," in which he had previously supported Holbrook Blinn on the New York stage. Mr. Allister is called upon to portray, in "Three Live Ghosts," the role of a shell-shocked British soldier who escapes from a prison camp in the company of a cockney warrior and an American fugitive from justice who is hiding in the English army. Since he was one of Lord Kitchener's "First Hundred Thousand" soldiers who went to France, and as he served four years in the British army and was twice wounded in action, it is a logical assumption that his experience equipped him for understanding of the psychology of his character.

Like Claude Allister, Robert Montgomery found his way into films through the Los Angeles stage. The third member of the wraith-like trio, Montgomery, appears as William Foster, alias Jones, with $5,000 reward offered for him, a sum that "Old Sweetheart" would dearly love to annex, even at cost of betraying her stepson's companion-in-arms. Young Montgomery has supported William Faversham, Grace George, Laura Hope Crews, Margaret Lawrence and other stars on the stage. He was acting in "Possession" in Los Angeles when Director Freeland picked him for the role of the third ghost.

Thornton Freeland, the director of "Three Live Ghosts," did not come to his post through production of a $5.86 epic film; he did not dramatize the libidos of cake pans and turbines, and he is not the nephew of any film magnate. The young man has been editing films and serving as assistant director to D. W. Griffith, Ernst Lubitsch and Roland West for the past fourteen years.

VIVIAN FAY, one of the sunkist sirens in "Fantasma" the second Fanchon and Marco revue, at the Fox.

LILLIAN GISH PLANS RETURN TO AUDIBILITY

Lillian Gish and Charlie Chaplin held out longest against talking pictures, but now only Chaplin will remain silent. Miss Gish will offer Ferenez Molnar's "The Swan" as her first all-talking picture. United Artists will distribute it.

Pursuits of canaries and scurryings around rose bushes now are things of the past with Lillian Gish. In a role that Eva La Gallienne played on the New York stage, a modern and romantic role, Miss Gish will emerge on the audible screen as a dramatic actress. Her character will be that of a daughter of one of Europe's royal families of the present day.

Max Reinhardt was to have directed Miss Gish in her first picture for United Artists, but vain search for a story precluded such an arrangement at the time; now it is a young Austrian, who was trained on Berlin stages as a Reinhardt actor, who directs Miss Gish—Paul Stein. Stein has just completed Ann Harding's newest talking picture for Pathe, "Her Private Affair." Rod La Rocque, Conrad Nagel and Marie Dressler will have principal supporting roles in Miss Gish's first talking picture.

"The Swan" will be placed in production at the United Artists' studio in Hollywood, on October 15. John W. Considine, jr., studio production executive; Director Stein and Melville Baker, who translated and adapted the play for the New York stage, are now at work on the scenario of Molnar's success. Miss Gish is in New York preparing an apartment for her mother, who has been living in Germany for her health, and who will return from Europe soon with her other daughter, Dorothy, who has been making talking pictures in England. Lillian Gish will go to Hollywood in several weeks. Her apekticism about talking pictures, combined with the Reinhardt incident, kept her off the screen for two years.

Lillian Gish's last appearance on the stage was made at the Republic Theater, in New York, in 1913, in David Belasco's "A Good Little Devil," in which Mary Pickford and Ernest Truex played principal roles.

ED & TOM HICKEY, featured comedians in C. A. Niggemeyer's "Romance Isle" revue, on the Palace stage this week.

NEILAN GETS MUSICAL HIT ON RKO'S LOT

"Beyond those talkie Alps lies Italy," quoth Marshall Neilan, director of scores of successful silent motion picture dramas when confronted with the problem of directing singing-dancing-talking musicals for the screen, and forthwith he accepted the assignment from William Le Baron to direct "Tanned Legs" for Radio Pictures as the first of the talkie Alps to be conquered.

And, having come, seen and conquered the heart of Le Baron with his successful direction of "Tanned Legs," he was asigned one of the biggest melody plums on the RKO lot, "The Vagabond Lover," with Rudy Vallee and his Connecticut Yankees.

This Radio opus, of course, just brims over with song, dance and vocal bon mots, but they have no terrors now for the man who has in his eventful silent career piloted such stars as Mary Pickford and other brilliant luminaries to celluloid fame. He even directed Peggy Hopkins Joyce in "Skyrocket."

Mr. Neilan is now busily engaged in the task of helping select the cast of "The Vagabond Lover," with some thousands of girls said to be wildly eager to play the femme lead opposite Rudy Vallee. But, of course, the leading lady will have to be a bright and particular star in her own right to qualify for that post, as Radio Pictures has made extravagant plans, on a par with its "Rio Rita" and "Hit the Deck" productions, for this piece which has been given "road show" status by its producers.

SCREEN LIFE IN HOLLYWOOD

By HUBBARD KEAVY.

HOLLYWOOD.—Dolores Del Rio is back in Hollywood with a clearer conception of the geography of the United States and full of wonder because people seem to regard movie actresses as fanciful beings.

Dolores Del Rio.

And she is amazed, too, because people she met asked her about such unimportant things as the kind of perfume she uses and what she likes to eat best.

"I sure surprised them in one place," Dolores told me. "I was hungry for a hamburger sandwich and a glass of milk. I guess they thought I lived on caviar and champagne."

Miss Del Rio made appearances in several large cities where "Evangeline" was being shown. It was the first time she had been on the stage, but after the first few days she didn't have to rely on her previously written speech because her stage fright left her and she "ad libbed," often longer than the specified time.

Dolores was showered with gifts everywhere and brought back a collection of things that included handmade underwear and love birds.

No Use for Diets.

Miss Del Rio says she was asked more questions about the so-called "Hollywood diet" than about anything else. And she disappointed her inquirers by telling them she thought dieting was absurd; that she had never dieted to keep at 110 pounds and never expected to have to.

"But every Hollywood actress diets, doesn't she?' they asked me. When I told them that actresses eat like every one else does they could hardly believe it. People seem to think we aren't human out here in Hollywood. I'd like to know how they get such funny ideas."

Dolores apparently didn't study American geography when she went to school in Mexico. She told her manager, on the way from Minneapolis to Seattle, that she was glad to be getting near home. She thought Seattle was near northern California.

Here and There.

Barbara Stanwyck, who came from a night club to play the lead in "Burlesque," may appear in a film opposite her husband, Frank Fay...Bryant Washburn, an old film favorite, is playing on a local stage, the first time in eighteen years...Mary Nolan, the girl who was Imogene Wilson, wants a play taken from the sensational book, "Scarlet Sister Mary" She wants to play the negro girl in it.

Hoot Gibson was born in Tekemah, Nebr.

Ringside.

Marjorie White, a baby-talking blues singer, likes fights. While on the stage she never had a chance to see them, but now that she's working daytimes in the movies, she goes to matches on Monday, Wednesday and Friday nights.

That Name.

The ususual first name of ZaSu Pitts is a combination of two names. In order to please two aunts when the Pitts baby was born, she was named after both. One was Eliza and the other Susan.

Moving Day.

The Kansas Rogers family, almost an institution in that State, is leaving there to live with the 6-foot son, "Buddy," in Hollywood.

Charles Rogers.

It took young Charles Rogers a long time to convince his father that he should get rid of his weekly newspaper in Olathe and come to California, and just as long to sell his mother on the idea.

"I never thought they'd leave home," says young Rogers, "because my grandparents, mother and father and my brother and sister and I were born there, and it seemed that the Rogers would always be a part of Olathe.

"I'm starting a home here and they're coming out about Christmas time. I don't know whether Dad has sold his paper yet, but he's had it up for sale.

"My brother and sister are coming, too. My brother is in college now, playing the drums and the trombone in the orchestra, as I used to. I think he's got the movies in the back of his head and probably in two or three years he'll make a stab at them."

He Surprised Them.

Buddy recently spent four weeks making appearances in Chicago and Detroit theaters, and what an adventure that was! It was his first stage appearance and he was received at every performance with tumultuous applause and cheers. Hundreds of girls, he says, waited at the stage door and whenever he came out of the theater some of the more aggressive ones usually captured his necktie and handkerchief.

The young actor made more than an appearance at the theaters. He actually did something. He had a seventeen-minute act in which he played seven musical instruments. They laughed when he sat down at the piano, but their laughter soon turned to amazement.

Likes the Stage.

"I guess it surprised them when they saw me play," Buddy says. "I don't play very well, but I play loud. It's all by ear. People told me they never saw a movie star do anything before, so my act went over in a big way.

"I'm going on the stage some time in a musical show, if I can arrange to get away from the studio. I like the movies so well that I'm going to stay in them as long as I can, but if they ever kick me out I know what I'll do."

And Why Not?

It is reported that unlimited means have been placed at the disposal of D. W. Griffith for his first dialogue picture, "Abraham Lincoln."

BIG RADIO SHOWS AHEAD FOR FANS

SILENCE TO RULE IN ALL

By ROBERT D. HEINL.

Preceded by curtain-raisers in the way of radio shows in Detroit, St. Louis, Cincinnati and Cleveland, the Sixth Annual Radio World's Fair in Madison Square Garden in New York City next week officially opens the 1929-30 radio season. This will be the formal notice to the listening public that new radio models of all makes are now available, that static is on the toboggan and the very best listening season with the finest programs ever provided in the history of radio are just ahead.

The big ballyhoo in New York is to be followed by others in many parts of the country.

Radio Shows Everywhere.

New Haven, Kansas City and Minneapolis are staging shows almost smultaneously with New York. The Pittsburgh Radio Show will begin September 30, Milwaukee will be the host to the Seventh Wisconsin Radio-Music Exposition October 1, the Ninth Annual Boston Radio Exposition will begin October 7, New York will have a second opportunity to view the latest in radio appliances at the First National Electrical Exposition in the Grand Central Palace in New York City, October 7, and there will be a second display in Detroit October 21, when the Detroit Radio Show is held, the initial exhibition having been the First Annual International Radio Exposition in Detroit, September 9.

New Orleans will hold its Radio Show October 21; the Seventh Annual Chicago Radio Show will begin on the same day; the Fourth Annual Exposition is scheduled for October 28, and the Philadelphia Electric and Radio Show will open its doors on November 11.

May Reach One Million.

With the above shows definitely scheduled, and many others to be held, it is safe to assume that probably a million fans will attend these expositions during the course of the next season to see for themselves what is going on in the radio world. This is based on figures given by Arthur Stringer, who has contributed a very definite part in making the New York and Chicago shows a success. According to Mr. Stringer, the attendance at the Radio World's Fair last year was 287,000. This year he expects it will reach 325,000.

At Chicago, the attendance at the Trade Show, at which the public was not admitted, amounted to the unprecedented figure for such a gathering, of 31,000 distributors and dealers throughout the country. It is expected at the Chicago Radio Show, to which the public will be admitted, in October, the number of those attending will exceed a quarter of a million.

Displays Silent and Audible.

These radio shows are unique in industrial history not only because of their size but because in many cases the displays are duplicated, due to the fact that no sets are allowed to be demonstrated or heard in the Exposition Hall because of the pandemonium which might be raised with so many radio sets playing at once. Curiously enough, last year at the New York Radio Show, the music heard was broadcast throughout the hall in New York from a phonograph record.

The result of the restriction at the Chicago Trade Show, for instance, was that every radio manufacturer had a suite of rooms in from one to three adjoining hotels. While the necessary restrictions of silence in the Exposition Hall were observed, the contrary was the case in the four or five lake-front hotels which were packed from cellar to garret with radio sets going from morning till night full tilt—sometimes three and four in a single room.

Manufacturers and Editors to Meet.

In connection with the New York show there will be numerous trade gatherings, including a directors' meeting of the Radio Manufacturers Association Wednesday morning, and Tuesday afternoon preceding newspaper radio editors will gather at the Park Central Hotel for the purpose of affecting a permanent organization.

Harry La Mertha, of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, chairman pro tem, will preside at the meeting, which will adopt a constitution and by-laws and elect officers. The unique feature of the organization will be that it will have no dues. The meeting of the radio editors will be followed by a dinner tendered to them by radio show officials.

The broadcasters will have no official meeting during the week, but, nevertheless, will foregather informally.

PROGRAM HEAD

KENNETH H. BERKELEY, who arranges the local programs broadcast through WRC, and is in charge of the staff of announcers.

PLANNING PROGRAM REQUIRES FINESSE

Thoughtful Study Is Exacted as to What Radio Fans Will Desire.

STATEMENT BY LEADER

B. A. Rolfe, who knows Broadway restaurants intimately and who has the reputation of being an epicure, says that planning the programs of the Lucky Strike Dance Orchestra requires the same finesse that one must possess to order a proper meal.

"Picking out numbers for a radio program is not merely a matter of personal taste, but a thoughtful study of what is appropriate to the occasion and what one's guests will relish," said the maestro. Every program must prove tempting to the jaded musical appetite. Consequently there must always be verity—one or more musical courses that every one will like.

"Of course you know the fun that the etiquette books poke at the girl who always ordered chicken salad in a restaurant because the other dishes on the menu were all strange to her. Well, it's the same thing with a radio broadcast or dance music. We can't afford to give just 'chicken salad' to our audience of more than 40,000,000 people every week.

"What we must do is study the public taste and combine the good old standbys with the newest of the popular tunes that made Broadway Broadway. For while Broadway, and hence the music lovers of the Nation, are sentimental and are loyal to the songs of other days, the musical taste of the Nation is constantly changing. In fact, styles in music alter as rapidly as styles in dress, and the successful broadcast orchestra must keep strictly abreast of the times.

"As a result of radio, the whole American people have become music conscious, and our national cultivation along musical lines is probably greater today than that of any other country. It is true that other nations have their typical music, their folk songs and national dances, but it has remained for America to insist upon the greatest variety and the finest quality of dance music on the air.

"Realizing this, those who prepare the Lucky Strike programs exercise the greatest care in planning each Saturday evening's selections. Only modern numbers that have proved their worth and old familiar airs which have stood the test of time are chosen. As a result, each broadcast is like a 'balanced menu.' Those who tune in are assured of a varied and delightful musical repast."

OFF THE ANTENNA

By ROBERT D. HEINL

South Bend, Ind., Sept. 21.—The building of a new plant here to manufacture Kennedy radio receiving sets marks the entrance of Col. George M. Studebaker and his affiliated interests into the radio field. Col. Studebaker is a director of the Kennedy Corporation, Clement Studebaker 3d, vice president, and F. H. Wellington, financial genius of the Studebaker properties, treasurer and chairman of the board of directors.

"To the power of a great name in radio—Colin B. Kennedy," Mr. Wellington declared, "is now added that of a great industrial figure—Studebaker."

Although the Kennedy-Studebaker production was started only about 90 days before these lines were written, the factory already has a large force of employes and is turning out around 500 console cabinet sets a day and making regular carload lot shipments all over the United States.

* * * *

Within the next 60 days it is expected that the number of employes will be increased and the daily production of sets doubled. The present buildings afford something like 100,000 square feet of space, but indicative of future development is the fact that the company has acquired eight acres so as not to be hampered for space in its progress.

"You know the Studebakers don't do things by halves," Colin B. Kennedy remarked.

Although the fact as yet has hardly percolated through the radio world that Col. Studebaker and his associates are interested in the Kennedy Corporation, which, far from being a newcomer, is a pioneer in the radio industry, nevertheless the new concern already has more than $8,000,000 worth of business booked to date. If they keep going at the present rate, the prediction is made that it won't be long until considerably more than the eight acres will be built up with new branches of the factory.

Mr. Kennedy himself is optimistic, not only as to the 1929-30 radio season's outlook in so far as his own company is concerned, but for the whole industry generally.

"There is really no limit to the depth of the radio market for many years to come," Mr. Kennedy explained with enthusiasm. "The possibilities from a manufacturing standpoint are tremendous because there is no so-called saturation point in sight.

* * * *

"If there is a fly in the ointment, it is the methods used by some companies to encourage the public to buy new radio sets. For instance, the keynote of the advertising campaigns of some companies is planned to make the user think if he doesn't buy a screen grid set, any other kind will soon become an obsolete set.

"That is not the situation at all. Screen grid sets are all right, but they are not going to supersede the neutrodyne sets, at least for a long time to come. Both the screen grid and the neutrodyne sets have their advantages, but, as a friend of mine remarked the other day, 'if you have equal performance in both sets, isn't it logical to stick to the set which is the least experimental?' And there is a lot of good common sense in his observation.

"To better visualize the situation, just go back a couple of years. When A. C. (alternating current) sets came in, the tubes were a new product, and it took nearly a year before they were perfected.

STATION PETITIONS CLOG COMMISSION

Hearings Have to Be Divided Among Five Members of Radio Board.

400 CASES SCHEDULED

The Federal Radio Commission has been convinced by Government efficiency experts that too much time has been wasted by all five commissioners sitting in on hearings of applications for new stations, changes in frequency or increase in power, or whatnot. Consequently only one commissioner now listens to the often lengthy testimony of numerous witnesses on the merits of the petitioning station and the reasons why the application should be granted.

This step was almost a necessity this fall in view of the fact that almost 400 cases had been scheduled for hearings between September 3 and December 31. Had all the commissioners been obliged to sit in on these hearings—there are usually two or three a day consuming all the morning and a large part of the afternoon—little time would have been left for the dispatch of other and just as important radio business.

The four commissioners, other than the chairman, have each been assigned specific duties under the reorganization plan. Judge Eugene O. Sykes, vice chairman of the commission, as chairman of legal committee, will conduct most of the hearings. In case he is unable to attend, Commissioner Harold A. Lafount, the other member of the legal committee, will preside. In many instances an examiner may be named by this committee to obtain the testimony and report to the commission, thus relieving all the commissioners of the duty.

The full membership of the commission, or at least a quorum, will be required to act on the application on the basis of testimony, however, before a decision is announced.

The other division of duties on the commission are as follows: Engineering, Charles McK. Saltzman; field investigation, Commissioner Lafount; liaison, of general contact man, William D. L. Starbuck.

Now these tubes (227's) have been developed so that their life and general stability compare favorably with any tubes ever made.

* * * *

"It is generally conceded that screen-grid tubes (224's) are today in the same position as the 227's of two years ago. But in the face of that, some companies insist upon creating the impression with their advertisements that unless the prospective buyer gets a screen-grid set now, he will not have good program reception and that his neutrodyne set will be hopelessly out of date next year. And it's the wrong kind of impression to give anyone because the radio industry is not unstable—it is even more steady than some industries I could name.

"We are building screen-grid sets, yes, but we are also building just as many neutrodyne sets. Our engineers are on their toes to adopt any practical thing that will improve program reception, but, like many other manufacturers in the industry, we are not convinced that the time has come to scrap our neutrodyne equipment. We want to give the public what it wants, so we make both kinds of sets —'you pay your money and you take your choice.'"

* * * *

As Mr. Kennedy, who, though Canadian by birth, looks more like an Irish poet than a radio manufacturer, talked, a telegraph instrument on a nearby table began clicking. This revealed a system of communication in the Kennedy factory perhaps not duplicated elsewhere in this day of inter-departmental telephones.

"It's a relic of my past," explained Mr. Kennedy, who was formerly a radio-telegraph operator. This line connects my office with that of William B. Nevin, our general sales manager, who also was once an operator, and with the laboratory, where there are several ex-operators, including Rufus H. Caldwell, our chief engineer.

"This system," continued Mr. Kennedy, "has real merit, because we can communicate with each other without disturbing anyone. For instance, should Mr. Nevin be talking to someone he could listen to my incoming message without his conversation with that person being interrupted."

Mr. Kennedy, who was born in Teaswater, Ontairo, worked as a telegrapher in almost every city between Montreal and Vancouver, his first experience being at the very tender age of 14 years. He also served for two sessions in the press gallery in the House of Commons in Ottawa. While working for the British-Pacific Cable Co. at an isolated station at Banfield, B. C., 150 miles from any white settlement, he took up radio as a hobby at first, but soon became so interested in its possibilities that he decided to make it his life's work.

* * * *

His next step was to become a Canadian government wireless operator. Later he went to San Francisco, where he hooked up with the Federal Telegraph Co. At this time, Ellery Stone, now president of the Federal company, was employed by the company in the capacity of radio inspector in that district.

Mr. Kennedy has an enthusiastic way of attacking business problems and comes about as near making play of his work as anyone possibly could. Because of his youthful appearance, and the fact that he is only 43 years old, makes it hard to imagine him such a veteran. Yet he is one of the best-known radio set designers in America.

"Yes, I've seen quite a few changes in my time in the development of radio," remarked Mr. Kennedy while passing through the factory. He paused in front of one of his new receiving sets. "For instance, in St. Louis in 1919 we used to build a one-tube table model set and sell it for $285. Now we build an 8-tube set, mount it in a beautiful console cabinet and sell it for $152. And our de luxe model is only $189."

RADIO LEGISLATION VEILED IN SILENCE

Few Members of Congress Express Opinion on Antimonopoly Act.

DILL OPPOSES REPEAL

While the radio committee of the American Bar Association, the general counsel of the Federal Radio Commission, and the Radio Protective Association are engaged in a noisy battle over whether or not section 17 of the radio act of 1927—the antimonopoly provision—should be repealed, the members of the Senate committee on interstate commerce and the House merchant marine and fisheries committee, in whose hands the fate of the law lies, are, as a whole, sidestepping the issue on the ground, "The matter has not come before the committee yet and I don't care to express an opinion at this time."

Only a few of the outstanding figures in radio legislation, particularly Senators James Couzens, of Michigan, and C. C. Dill, of Washington, have been willing to reveal their attitudes on the issue in clear terms.

Two questions were asked each member of the congressional committees in letters, and, though a number of the senators and representatives were out of the city, the majority of those who did answer the query were noncommittal. Those on the Senate committee expressed the desire to hear the conclusion of the hearings in the communications inquiry before offering an opinion on the moot topics.

Two Questions Asked.

The questions were (1) Do you believe section 17 of the radio act should be repealed? If so, why? (2) Should the powers of the Federal Radio Commission be turned over to the Department of Commerce or should the commission take over the present departmental radio functions?

The most straight-forward answer on the first question came from Senator Dill, a tall and heavy Westerner, whose attitude has always been in opposition to anything that looked like a trust in the radio field.

"I believe it would be a mistake to repeal section 17 of the radio act," he said. "The combination of radio and cable companies would destroy the competition that is desirable for the lowering of the cost of such services as fast as conditions make it possible for rates to be lowered. The hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Senate this summer conclusively showed that the only real reason for the demand for the repeal of section 17 is to be found in the fact that the Radio Corporation of America has exclusive contract with English, French and German companies, which are under control of the governments of those countries. I do not believe the United States Congress should encourage such monopolistic contracts.

"The suggestion of turning the powers of the Radio Commission back to the Department of Commerce is a proposal for a backward step. Instead, the Radio Commission should have the functions now exercised by the Commerce Department with the possible exception of the control of purely governmental radio services."

Couzens Withholds Decision.

Although Senator Couzens is the author of the bill for the creation of a communications commission, which incorporates the sense of section 17 of the radio act, and while he is known as the leader of legislative attack on the alleged radio trust, he dodged the monopoly issue on the grounds that the hearings for which he is responsible have not been concluded.

"This committee is still considering Senate bill No. 6, which carries this provision of the present radio act," he said, "for that reason, I am not prepared at this time to say whether it should or should not be repealed."

Regarding the second question, he wrote:

"I believe the Radio Commission should be expanded to take over the transmission of radio, all wire communications, and the transmission of power in interstate commerce. I believe that the commission should take over all of the Department of Commerce radio functions in the same manner as the Interstate Commerce Commission takes charge of all transportation questions having to do with railroads."

Watson's Reply Terse.

Senator James E. Watson, Republican floor leader, of Indiana, replied with the terse statement: "I voted for section 17 of the radio act and am still for it." His mind is too occupied with tariff problems to discuss the matter further, he said.

Almost equally terse is the reply of Representative H. E. Rowbottom, of the First District of Indiana. He wrote: "I have looked over section 17 of the radio act and do not think it should be repealed."

Among those who answered the queries but who had nothing to say at the time were Senators Frederick M. Sackett, of Kentucky; Otis F. Glenn, of Illinois, and Alben W. Barkley, of Kentucky, and Representatives Charles L. Gifford, of Massachusetts, and S. O. Bland, of Virginia.

The fight on the antimonopoly provision of the radio act has been smoldering for some time, but within recent weeks it has flared up into one of the major issues of radio legislation.

Those who urge its repeal have pointed out that Great Britain is retaining supremacy in world communications by permitting the merger of its cable and wireless companies. American foreign communication services are consequently endangered, it is claimed, and the newly acquired leadership of this country is being sacrificed to the ancient prejudice against monopolies and the fear of trusts.

L. T. T. Ready to Buy R. C. A.

The Radio Corporation of America and the International Telephone & Telegraph Co. are foremost in the line of those who would repeal section 17. Col. Sosthenes Behn, president of International, in fact, testified at an early summer hearing of the Senate committee that his corporation stood ready to buy the Radio Corporation of America's communication interests as soon as the United States Government permits such a consolidation. He made a lengthy plea for such a merger.

Maj. Gen. George S. Gibbs, chief signal officer of the United States Army, has often found fault with the obstacle to a wire-wireless combination. In a recent issue of Public Utilities he wrote:

"The artificial separation of wire and radio is an erroneous basis of control and, until it is removed, it is bound to retard the development of both wire and radio and to prevent in a large measure that supplementary assistance that each could be to the other in the perfection of a real communications system designed to give the people the benefit of the highest development and application of these new servants of mankind."

The Radio Protective Association, of which Oswald F. Schuette is executive secretary and chief spokesman, is the leader of the fight to uphold section 17 and to prosecute the alleged radio trust, of which the Radio Corporation of America is the nucleus.

The matter has been put before Attorney General William D. Mitchell and even presented to President Hoover by Schuette in person. Standing behind Senator Couzens in the communications inquiry, Schuette is goading the Senate committee on to investigate every angle of the Radio Corporation and its associates.

The Federal Radio Commission has washed its hands of the affair, even though Bethuel M. Webster, its general counsel, suggested to Senator Couzens that section 17 was unnecessary in view of the Sherman and the Clayton antitrust laws. The standing committee on radio laws of the American Bar Association in an elaborate report has found the provision an obstacle to radio progress.

And so it looks like it's going to be a hand-to-hand encounter in the open now.

Broadcasting Used For Inauguration

Stations Are Established in Canada to Help Settle Northwest.

Radio has become a big factor in the colonization of Canada, and thousands of radio receivers made in the United States are aiding in the project. A. B. C. Scull, manager of the foreign department of the Radio-Victor Corporation of America, points out that his and other companies in the United States sold in Canada last year a total of more than $5,000,000 worth of radio receiving sets.

How that fits into the colonization project is indicated by the fact that the Canadian National Railways has adopted broadcasting as one of its chief aids in attracting settlers to the 240,000,000 acres of good farming land yet to be cultivated for the first time.

Lack of entertainment was one of the greatest drawbacks to pioneering. To offset that, the railroad company has established thirteen broadcasting stations. These and other stations in Canada, as well as many in the United States, are received regularly in isolated Canadian farms on receiving sets made in the United States.

Thomas Will Sing Tuesday Evening

Star Barytone of Royal Operas Will Be Heard Over Radios.

John Charles Thomas, the noted American barytone, will be the star of the second Eveready hour fall program Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock. As leading barytone of the Royal Opera London and the Royal Opera in Brussels, Thomas has achieved a reputation in the musical centers of Europe equal to the one he holds among lovers of fine music in this country.

His broadcast over Eveready hour will inaugurate a series of air concerts to be conducted by that hour during the present season and which will feature leading artists in each field of music On alternate weeks the Eveready hour will continue its dramatic presentations which have won it wide attention.

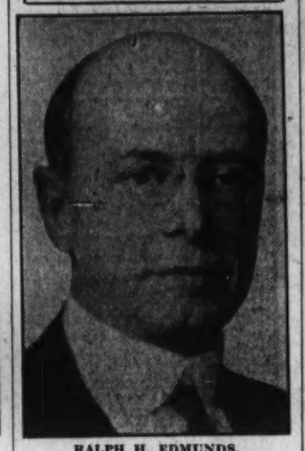
The program for Tuesday, which will be broadcast from WEAF and a national chain of stations, including WRC, will feature a series of arias and songs particularly adapted to Thomas' voice.

Apartment hunting is far from a pleasant task Why not look in the classified columns of The Washington Post. Perhaps the very place you are looking for is advertised today

DIRECTS WMAL

WILLIAM T. PIERSON, manager of Station WMAL, the local outlet of the Columbia Broadcasting System. Mr. Pierson has been connected with broadcasting since the old WCAP days.

RADIO VETERAN



RALPH H. EDMUNDS, manager of Station WRC, who has held that position since the first program was broadcast. Before that he was connected with the Metropolitan Opera Company.

THE LISTENER'S VIEWPOINT

Misses Grand Opera.

To the Radio Editor of The Post—Sir: It is with regret that I notice Station WRC will not broadcast the series of operas to be given this winter by the National Grand Opera Company.

The station has apparently also lost the Gilbert and Sullivan operas. I consider this an error in schedule arrangement.

It is regrettable that performances like the above, of great merit and value to your public, must be denied us so as to make room for a fifteen-minute Amos and Andy sponsored performance of little merit, appealing to the "moron" type of mind. I do not object to wasting the fifteen minutes of the evening to Amos and Andy, but consider that the substitution of their performance of high merit and entertainment as an unfair and undesirable exchange. One night a week of Amos and Andy is "a plenty."

Please endeavor to have the two opera companies placed on WRC's schedule. I. W.

To the Radio Editor of The Post—Sir: My peeve this time is regarding the change in WRC programs whereby Amos and Andy are put on the air and Seth Parker is kept off. No doubt the NBC has had lots of praise for "Amos and Andy," or they would not have put them on the air, but I am glad to say that my taste does not run that way, neither that of various other people I have asked for their opinion of Amos and Andy. I understand that WRC is trying to please the majority, but to put on Amos and Andy on Sunday night is—well, it is and more too.

I am especially fond of the biblical story, not that I am a church member, but the story is well put on. The Challenger Hour last week was also very well done and most interesting. I am sorry the operas are not to be sent out over WRC. Quite a number of listeners-in do not have sets powerful enough to reach distant stations so will be unable to hear the operas. A. H.

Chicago Civic Opera Broadcasts.

To the Radio Editor of The Post—Sir: Will it be possible for WRC to include the Chicago Civic Opera Company broadcasts in its schedule for this year? We have been left out the last two years and since this is one of the finest programs yet offered by the National Broadcasting Co., it would seem that Washington listeners should have it. The NBC has a much wider coverage on several much less worthy features. G.

Ido Supplants Esperanto.

Freiberg, Germany, Sept. 21 (A.P.). Esperanto must give way before "Ido" in the claim to being the world language, according to opinion voiced at the International Ido Congress, holding its sessions here under the presidency of Judge Guntz, of Waldkirch, Baden.

INSPIRATIONAL POET TO BROADCAST AGAIN

Edgar A. Guest Will Recite Verses From Majestic Theater of Air.

RADIO POEM IS WRITTEN

"America's favoriet poet," Edgar A. Guest, is coming back to the Majestic Theater of the Air Sunday evening, September 22, at 8 o'clock.

Many will remember Guest's first chain broadcast—the Majestic program of June 30—when for the first time the entire Nation could listen to the voice of the man whose daily poems are the inspiration of thousands of American households. The approving letters which came to Wendell Hall on that program induced him to engage the Detroit poet for another Majestic program.

These letters were forwarded to Poet Guest, who was spending summer in the woods of Michigan.

Writes Radio Poem.

Wendell Hall has just received a letter from Guest inclosing a radio poem which he is to read on the evening of September 22. At the conclusion of the letter Eddie's typewriter had clicked these words:

"I am sorry to say I have not as yet found time to go through all those wonderful letters, but I will go through the rest of them carefully before the season closes. Work occupies all my spare time."

Nevertheless, the poet did have time to write a characteristically inspirational poem about radio, a printed copy of which is to be mailed to each listener requesting it.

Final Lines Quoted.

The concluding stanza of the poem is as follows:

"Oh, happier world, where all may know
The miracle of radio!
These things of tubes and wires now grace
The mansion and the cottage place—
And rich and poor alike may share
The golden harvest of the air!"

In addition to the poem "Radio," a photograph of Guest will be sent to each one who sends a written request to the Majestic Theater of the Air on this occasion. Immediately after his Majestic performance the distinguished poet will go to Hollywood to make his first "talkie."

In addition to Edgar A. Guest, the master of ceremonies, Wendell Hall, will present the Arnold Johnson Orchestra, Redferne Hollinshead and the Majestic Male Quartet in a musical program appropriate to the inspirational period to be spent with "America's favoriet poet."

ULTIMATUM GIVEN IN MUSIC LITIGATION

Levy Files Answers in Suit by American Society of Composers.

FEES HELD NOT ENOUGH

The answer to the suit started by Dr. Leon Levy, of Station WCAU in Philadelphia, is an ultimatum from E. C. Mills, of New York, chairman of the administrative committee of the American Society of Composers, which promises a brand-new war along the radio musical front.

The broadcasters and composers have fought back and forth for years over the question of how much radio stations should pay for the privilege of broadcasting copyrighted music, but with the stations coming across in pretty good shape there has been no fighting in public of late, though the broadcasters have privately resented what they declare to be the increasing demands of the composers, the last occasion of this being at the meeting of the national broadcasters in Chicago recently. The intimation there was that the composers were out to give the broadcasters a good squeezing.

Declare Fee Incommensurate.

However, open warfare was resumed when Dr. Levy, who is a brother-in-law of William S. Paley, president of the Columbia Broadcasting System, declared in court that the rate demanded of WCAU was exorbitant and that the composers this year intended to increase their fee 100 per cent.

"The fee quoted Station WCAU in Philadelphia instead of being exorbitant," declared Mr. Mills, "is ridiculously incommensurate with the value involved."

Whereupon Mills said, showing further fight, that the composers' society can no more permit the broadcaster to decide what he will pay the composers than the broadcaster could permit the advertisers to establish the rate which they would pay for service from the station.

Mr. Mills said as yet he had not been officially notified about the Philadelphia suit.

"If and when we are, we will be ready for a finish fight," Mills went on. "In the meantime, unless the station secures license, it will be prosecuted for every infringement of the copyright of any member of the society occurring in the process of any unauthorized public performance thereof.

Raised Fee With Power.

"The station has held license of the society since September 1, 1926. During the first year, when the station was undergoing the experimental period of being established, it was charged $1,500 per annum. During the second and third years, after it had become established at a power input of 500 watts, it was charged $2,500 per annum. It has now increased its power input from 500 watts to 5,000 watts and its license fee rate for the right to use the repertoire of music copyrighted by the members of the society, has been increased to $5,000 per annum. It represents a charge of less than $2 per hour for use of the product which makes the whole broadcasting operation possible.

"No doubt the station would prefer to pay a smaller fee. Most stations would have that preference. However, I have no doubt also that the advertisers who purchase 'time on the air' from the station would like to pay less for the privilege. The fact remains, however, that just as the station has the full right to fix the price it will charge for its service, so have our members, in all justice and fairness, a like right to charge for their product whatever they may deem it to be worth. The courts have sustained the right of the composers and authors to charge for the use of their works in broadcast performances. The fee charged Station WCAU is reasonable and fair and entirely in line with that paid by other comparable stations.

RCA MANAGER

who, as district manager of the Radio Corporation of America, has long been active in local radio circles.

Radio Brokerage Popular on Ships

The enthusiastic reception by the traveling public of the radio brokerage service on large ocean liners has hastened plans for expansion. The service was introduced a few weeks ago. Charles J. Pannill, vice president and general manager of the Radiomarine Corporation of America, is now in Europe consulting with communications authorities of London, Paris and Berlin, with a view to expediting the installation of suitable short-wave apparatus on shipboard.

Ship brokerage offices already have been installed on the Leviathan, Berengaria, Ile de France and the Majestic. Special apparatus has been perfected by the Radiomarine Corporation of America to provide a continuous flow of stock quotations between the operator aboard ship and an operator in the brokerage office on shore. Orders may be executed without interrupting the transmission of other transactions.

BEDTIME ON FARM FOUND STATIONARY

Largest Rural Air Audience at 8:30 o'Clock, Then Falling Off.

HIGH NOON IS POPULAR

Bedtime back on the farm remains one of the few things American which have remained practically stationary for a century, it is disclosed in a radio survey to determine the time of day the farmer listens to broadcast, made public here by the Bremer-Tully Institute of Radio Research.

"The urban propensity to make whoopee has not affected the 'backbone of the Nation,' otherwise the farm population," declared Richard E. Smiley, director of the institute. "That fact is definitely determined by the result of some 30,000 individual replies to queries sent to radio owners in agricultural centers throughout the Nation.

"Time when the largest farm audience is on the air is at exactly 8:30 o'clock in the evening. From that time on the audience rapidly falls off."

Presumably the audience falls off to sleep, although the survey does not in so many words say so.

"Eight-thirty p. m. is the peak hour for the Nation as a whole," according to Mr. Smiley. "In the Middle West a maximum is reached at 8 o'clock, with a decrease noted by 8:30 p. m.

"Only a few farm folks listen to radio programs before noon, or in the afternoon. The average morning audience runs less than one-tenth of the total. High noon is a favorite time for exercising the dials, with approximately 60 per cent of the farm radio users on the air then."

As a result of the institute's survey it was found that less than 3 per cent of the radios used on farms nowadays are crystal sets, while the vast majority were new model battery sets.

Culbertson Is Editor Of Rare Old Editions

Owen Culbertson, of the Radio Corporation of America, has a bobby which is bringing him distinction in a new field of letters, viz., that of reviving and editing rare old books on the chase. His latest volume is a narrative poem entitled "The Legend of the Hounds." It follows closely on the heels of "Gambodo's Academy for Brown Horsemen," which stirred much favorable criticism several months ago.

Both volumes have been published for only a select few and have been beautifully illustrated with drawings by Gordon Ross. An even more limited number of volumes of each has been specially bound and illustrated in color.

Baltimore Schools Have Radios.

Twenty-nine Baltimore schools are now equipped with receiving sets, and the students have taken a great interest in the programs received, according to the superintendent's annual report. Especial interest was reported in the Damrosch concerts last year.

TUBE CLAUSE CASE CONTINUED IN COURT

CHICAGO FIRMS JOIN

Filing of a $3,000,000 triple damage suit by the DeForest Radio Co. against the Radio Corporation of America in the United States District Court at Wilmington, Del., threatens a serious situation for the "Radio Trust." The DeForest Radio Co. is one of the plaintiffs in the famous "tube clause" suit, in which Judge Hugh M. Morris, of that court, held that the Radio Corporation of America's patent contract with 27 radio set manufacturers violated the Clayton law.

Since last spring Judge Morris has had under advisement the question of granting a permanent injunction under his finding. Under the radio law, such a permanent injunction would render the Radio Corporation liable to the forfeiture of its broadcasting and communications licenses.

Three of the coplaintiffs of the DeForest company in this suit were recently merged. Announcement was made at the time that the Radio Corporation of America had loaned $2,000,000 to the merger. The new company also agreed to abandon the proceedings before Judge Morris, and it was assumed that this would be the end of the "tube clause" case.

Announcement by the DeForest company of the filing of its triple damage claims indicates that the "tube clause" case is not to be dropped, so that Judge Morris may still render a decision on its merits.

Similar triple damage suits against the Radio Trust, under the "tube clause," were filed a week ago at Wilmington by the Mellotron Tube Corporation and Vesta Battery Corporation, both of Chicago. They allege damages of $1,000,000 and $750,000, respectively.

Venezuela Ratifies Past.

Venezuela is the most recent country to ratify the work of the International Radiotelegraphic Convention, which met in Washington in 1927, the Department of State has been informed by the Venezuelan Minister, Senor Dr. Don Carlos F. Grisanti.

MOTORING and AVIATION

Carcasses of Dead Cars Create Baffling Problem

25,000,000 Must Be Buried Within 10 Years, But Nobody Seems to Know Just Where; Junking Draws Protests; Many Methods Fail.

By WILLIAM ULLMAN.

Junk yards! Junked cars! Regulations to drive junk automobiles off the highways. Junk allowances given to dealers by motor-car factories. Two and one-half million cars junked last year. More to be junked this year.

"Junk" beyond doubt is a word that is looming larger yearly in the lexicon of motoring. Individuals who own junk cars are wondering how to dispose of them. Dealers with large stocks of discarded vehicles are equally puzzled. Sell them to junk yards? But suppose there is no junk yard. Frequently there is none. Starting a junk yard is sometimes a profitable business. But it has its handicaps. The neighbors protest. To them the junk yard is an eyesore. They take their objections to municipal officials. Others take it to the State officials. The problem constantly involves a larger number. In the opinion of every one involved it can do nothing but grow.

It was just a few weeks ago that the president of one of New York's boroughs asked the man who has made more automobiles than any other in the world to aid in solving the junk-car problem. Having brought so many cars into the world, the municipal official assumed that the latter should be equally efficient in taking them out of it again. But the manufacturer had no off-hand solution for the problem. It is far too big for an off-hand answer by anyone. That is the opinion of those who have studied it.

25,000,000 Soon Dead.

It is possible for the individual heretofore heedless of the problem to get, fairly simply, an idea of its extent. Whether he walks or rides, every one is conscious of traffic congestion. There are more than 25,000,000 cars in operation, including passenger cars, commercial delivery vehicles, buses and large trucks. Within seven years, according to Government figures, these 25,000,000 cars will have outlived their usefulness.

Assuming that each of them takes up on an average of 50 square feet, it would take a cemetery containing 1,250,000,000 square feet to bury them, leavnig no space between the "corpses." In area the cemetery would cover more than 3,100 acres.

There are 25,000,000 motor vehicles. There are approximately 500,000 miles of surfaced highway in the United States. That means 50 motor vehicles to the mile. In seven years these cars will have died. Where will they be buried, along with the numerous others that will have met death prematurely in accidents?

"It is something to think about," says one of the most progressive State motor vehicle officials. The average man must agree.

The part of the junk dealer in the situation is set forth by Motor Vehicle Commissioner Robins B. Stoeckel, of Connecticut, as follows:

"He is responsible for the car cemeteries which are beginning to appear along side our roads, some of them located in the most beautiful sections of the State. At present the size, extent and general ugliness of these attest the popularity and probable profit of this kind of business.

Become Public Nuisance.

"While there does not appear to be any method at the present time whereby the defacement of scenery and loss of attractiveness on the side of highways caused by such spectacles can be met, there should be some way devised by which owners of land are prevented from making it a public nuisance. The argument in favor of this is perhaps idealistic, but it is practical nevertheless.

"The scenery has a real and practical value. People are attracted by the surroundings more than by any other characteristic to purchase real estate, to build homes and to use land for vacation purposes. Apparently it is perfectly possible under existing laws to restrain other nuisances; for instance, the law may be invoked to prevent the erection of a slaughter house or a soap factory in an unsuitable place. Why should there not be a law to prevent a man from making a nuisance in an esthetic sense and thereby preserve for homebuilders the practical values of real estate?"

The course of the junk dealer, who might be assumed to be a big factor in solving the problem, obviously is one hedged about with its particular difficulties.

More and more States are compelling the junking of unsafe automobiles. Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Maryland, New Jersey and New York are among those which are seeking to get such cars off the highway. But where to put them once they are off the highway is another question.

Why not dismantle them? Why not drive them out along some country road and leave them? Why not drive them into the river? Or, into some farmer's pasture? Why not literally bury them in holes that are to be filled for building or something similar?

Those engaged in the effort to dispose of old cars have definite answers for all of these proposed solutions.

Started by Junk Dealers.

Take that with reference to dismantling the decrepit car. Thousands are being dismantled all the time. Junk dealers started it. Automobile dealers through their trade bodies later got into the business. Dismantling a car, however, they have found does not remove all traces of it from the face of the earth. Engine and drive mechanism as to certain parts are about all that is worth dismantling. Usully, there is left the body, the chassis, the tireless wheels—as forlorn a sight as anyone would care to see. That has to be disposed of after the dismantling. So, the process does not solve the problem.

As to driving them out along some country road and deserting them, that cannot be done either. Several States have made it a criminal offense to do so on the ground that the deserted vehicle constitutes a hazard regardless of how far over to the side of the right-of-way it is moved. The owner of such a car in these days is not allowed to drive it because it is unsafe. He is not allowed to desert it because that is unsafe. Sometimes, he cannot sell it because no junk man will buy it. Sometimes he cannot give it away because there is no one who will take it. As white elephants go, the ancient car sometimes can be the whitest of them all.

As to driving them into the river, that also is against the law. So is leaving them on somebody's property.

Dumping them into holes that are to be filled up for building or other purposes is practiced to a limited extent. Only, however, where the cars and the holes are fairly close together. If it is necessary to move the care to the hole, the handling involved makes the move economically unwise.

Many ideas have been tried and are being tried, it is pointed out. Some are successful in some places; others elsewhere. None, however, is completely the answer to the problem.

So the quest for a satisfactory answer continues and will continue for sometime, in the opinion of many officials battling with it.

In the meantime, the carcasses of many dead cars clutter up the fair countryside.

Designer Proves Self Right as Plane Stalls

Aviation's good stories are endless, both as to number and variety. One of its finest is that involving the effort of a famous plane designer—who was scarcely so famous at the time—to prove the safety and stability of his plane to a group of high military officials.

One factor in the proof process was taking them for a flight. The point made prior to the test was that the plane would not go from a stall into a spin, but would level off and come down naturally in case of a sudden power-plant failure. After a few minutes in the air with his precious and important human cargo the designer, who had said the ship would not spin, pulled it into a stall. Having only the word of the ship builder that everything would be all right, the passengers, who knew something about planes themselves, were first amazed, then alarmed. It was quite a moment for the whole group. The designer happened to be right, and his way of proving it was so impressive that it never has been forgotten.

DANGEROUS CURVES GETTING NEEDED GUARD RAILS

Illustrated here are two types of guard rails which are giving motorists an increasing measure of protection on the Nation's highways. At the top a thick stone wall, and, at the bottom, a substantial fencing, which serves the same purpose. These and other similar factors are making touring safer and more pleasurable throughout the country.

Routine Service Urged for Autos

Maintenance Given to Locomotives Advised to Motorists.

Pointing out that regular inspection and expert attention result in the long and uninterrupted service rendered by railway locomotives, motor car service managers say that similar maintenance on the part of automobile owners would have an equally desirable effect.

At first thought, it is said, it might appear that the locomotive retains its youth because it runs on a "highway" far smoother than the finest boulevard and this does contribute to some extent to the engine's long life. But, it is added, regardless of roadbed and rails, the locomotive soon would find its way to the scrap heap were it not carefully inspected and adjusted after every run by expert mechanics.

In the opinion of motor service authorities, if this fact holds true with respect to the locomotive, it should prevail to an even greater extent with the automobile. Because the motor car, instead of following a pair of smooth steel rails, must travel over an irregular surface that imposes constantly changing strains and stresses. And seldom, even after weeks and months of continuous operation, do many automobiles receive the care and attention needed by every fine mechanism.

If owners of motor cars gave them the same routine service received by every locomotive, it is held by service leaders that the useful lives of cars would be lengthened greatly, and the great performance built into the modern automobile maintained indefinitely.

Three Costly Practices Damaging to Tires

Turning corners at high speeds which shifts the weight of the car to one side, suddenly stepping on the accelerator and spinning the wheels, and rushing up to corners and slamming on the brakes are three practices that take a great deal more life out of the tires than many car owners imagine.

U. S. Dirigibles, Not Graf, To Be Patterns for Future

Will Have Many More Advantages Over Ship Which Has Circumnavigated the Globe; Unusual Construction in Noninflammable Bag.

By FRANK J. CARMODY.

"Great! These big dirigibles that we're building in this country will have to go some to beat that record."

That was the average American's reaction to the remarkable around-the-world flight of the Graf Zeppelin. He desired to take nothing from the glory of Dr. Eckener's famous voyage. But he began to wonder considerably about the huge dirigibles that this country is building, about which his knowledge is somewhat hazy. The Graf Zeppelin's flight was to the dirigible world what Lindbergh's was to the airplane realm. It made the public airship-minded. The public began to want to know about airships. Especially was it curious about those to be constructed for the Navy.

Although barely beyond the blueprint stage, there is little question that these huge craft will far outperform the Graf Zeppelin, just as a 1929 automobile outperforms one made in 1926. They involve a score or more of important improvements in construction, in the arrangements for passengers, for load carrying, for resisting the most violent weather, in power plants—in speed, safety, size and comfort.

It comes as a surprise to most persons to learn that although the new ships are virtually twice the size of the Graf, they are only 15 feet longer. One generally associates dirigible size with length. They are in no way synonymous. The Graf Zeppelin is 770 feet long. The Navy dirigibles will be 785 feet. The former, however, has a bag 100 feet in diameter at the main ring. The latter are 133 feet at this point. The Graf's bag has a cubic foot content of 3,700,000; those of the Navy's craft will hold 6,500,000 cubic feet of lifting and fuel gas. That is the explanation of the phase, "almost twice the size."

Helium Will Be Used.

It is because they will be inflated with helium gas that partly explains the greater size of the American dirigibles as compared with either the Graf or the 5,000,000-cubic foot airships now nearing completion in England. Helium does not have the lifting capacity of hydrogen. Because of this, the lift of the American ships while greater than that of the Graf will be about equal with that of the 5,000,000-cubic foot ships being constructed in England.

If, however, helium does not compare so favorably with hydrogen as to lift—due to its greater weight, of course—it annihilates the latter when other characteristics are compared. As is generally known, it is nonflammable. That makes all the difference in the world. It has made a tremendous difference in the construction of the American dirigibles, making possible a design that could not even be considered if hydrogen were to be the inflation agent. For example, the elimination of the fire hazard has:

Made possible the placing of passenger quarters within the hull.

Permitted the location of the engines inside the ship.

Vastly simplified the question of the disposition of the fuel used by the airship's engines.

Made possible a markedly different type of hull construction.

Comforts Were Necessary.

So long as the passenger quarters and engine rooms had to be located outside the hull of the ship, where they protruded into the air stream and offered resistance to the ship's forward progress, they were necessarily restricted as to size. The larger they were, the more resistance they offered. So they were made as small as possible consistent with reasonable comfort. Promenades, libraries and smoking rooms were impossible under such circumstances. As a matter of fact, one of the hardships noted by some passengers on the Graf Zeppelin was the inability to "catch a smoke now and then."

It long has been apparent to proponents of the airship that if the 30-year dream of Count Zeppelin of

SAFETY CONGRESS TO STUDY TRAFFIC

Eighteenth Annual Session Will Be Begun in Chicago September 30.

CONTROL SPECIAL TOPIC

Continuous five-day sessions on the problem of traffic control will be an important feature of the forthcoming eighteenth annual safety congress, to be held in Chicago September 30 to October 4.

This "traffic school" will begin on Monday afternoon, September 30, with a general public safety session. The chairman will be Col. Albert A. Sprague.

Paul Hoffman, vice president of the Studebaker Corporation, will be the first speaker, on the subject "America Demands Speed—and Safety." Dr. Louis I. Dublin, noted statistician, will discuss "The Case Against Accidents." Judge Hugh A. Locke, of Birmingham, Ala., will speak on "Lawlessness on the Highways." Fred M. Schortemeier, president, Indianapolis Safety Council, will speak on "Accidents a Community Problem."

The Tuesday morning session will relate to statistical information, which field is vitally associated with traffic control. The Tuesday afternoon and evening sessions will include topics and demonstrations relating to public school patrols, and pageants by children.

The Wednesday morning subject will be "Traffic Administration and Enforcement." The chairman will be Clifford Davis, commissioner of fire and police of Memphis, Tenn. The following subjects will be discussed by experts: "What Is an Adequate Traffic Force?" "Checking Up on Vehicle Conditions," "Freeing the Traffic Courts for Important Cases."

Special Motor Tour.

On Wednesday afternoon there will be a specially arranged traffic motor tour by delegates. It will include visits to Chicago points of interest, illustrating traffic problems and accomplishments toward their solution.

The route will include Lincoln Park grade separation, the traffic signal systems on Broadway and Sheridan road, grade separations on Milwaukee avenue, Washington boulevard traffic control, the "Loop" signal system, Grant Park development.

The Thursday morning session, on "Traffic Problems," will include discussions of traffic problems and controls noted during the previous afternoon. The chairman will be August Vollmer, professor of police administration, University of Chicago, and former chief of police of Berkeley, Calif. The special topics for this session are: "Cashing in on Accident Records;" "Reserving 'Main Street' for Essential Traffic;" "The Model Traffic Ordinance," and "Highways of the Future."

The general topic for Thursday afternoon will be "The Human Side of Traffic Accidents." There will be discussions on "The Driver's Responsibility for Accidents," "Public Education for Public Safety." "The Relation Between Personality and Accidents."

Noted Authority Chairman.

The subject for Friday morning will be "Traffic Engineering Methods." The chairman will be a national authority in this field—Dr. Miller McClintock, director of the Erskine Bureau of Street Traffic Research, Harvard University.

Reyburn Hoffman, city traffic engineer of St. Louis, will discuss "Methods for Making a Traffic Count." "Principles of Traffic Signal Timing" will be discussed by Theodore Matson, chief engineer of city-wide surveys for Kansas City. This will be followed by a round table discussion on "Traffic Engineering Problems," and all delegates are invited to bring their problems.

Remember Carbureaor Mixture.

If it is just a wee bit cooler these days, it may not be a bad idea to have the carburetor mixture enriched proportionately.

Looking Over the Cars

Some of the Points You May Have Missed

By THE OBSERVER

"Thou shalt not weave" is something that body designers have been saying, in effect at least, to the front part of the body for years. Every time the body refused to heed the injunction the engineer has hopped to the task of enforcing the command. One of the detailed steps he has taken in this connection is revealed in the latest Graham-Paige products, which have a steel brace between the front body pillars.

• • • •

Durant's 6-63 model is another to add to the long list of cars which have four-point rubber suspension of the engine.

• • • •

Certain chassis lend themselves best to certain bodies. That is the answer to those who, in looking over the cars, wonder at the fact that the Buick series 50 includes only a sedan and coupe.

• • • •

Winter may be some months away and some States may never have any winter. Still, that does not change the fact that among those cars which will have radiator shutters of the automatic kind this year are Peerless and Dodge. And before next spring brings its balmy breezes it would not surprise any one if there were still other recruits added to the growing list.

• • • •

Springs that compensate for frame weave are the order of the moment. That test of lifting one front wheel until the hub is 38 inches from the ground is Viking's way of showing how it has made the springs keep the car steady.

• • • •

The Austin car which is going to be manufactured in this country is not going to have a right-hand drive, as many have speculated. It is going to change over, just as American cars made for the European market have the steering shifted from left to right. The Austin change will be just the reverse.

• • • •

It is an interesting test that is suggested in Chevrolet's arguments for the use of genuine Chevrolet parts. "Take a Chevrolet piston pin and any other kind and rub them together," is the advice. "Then notice the effect on both." There is a certain suggestion of confidence in the fact that it is left entirely to the test maker to find what the effect is.

One might—but of course one should not—get the impression that 70 horsepower was standard for the sixes to be introduced in the summer of 1929. Both the new Hupmobile and the new Gardner have this power. And each offers a mile an hour per horsepower.

• • • •

Not so long ago it was discovered with surprise that the present Pontiac was not the first car to bear that name. There was another back in—wasn't it 1905? Now it develops that Marquette also is an old name. A car bearing it was manufactured in 1912. It should not have been surprising, this discovery. The same corporation made that earlier Marquette.

Giving the inside diameter of the tire certainly makes motor cars seem to have advanced radically from the era of 35-inch wheels. Auburn and Chrysler, among the many which do this, specify their tires as 18 by 5.50 on their smaller cars. On the other hand, Lincoln and Locomobile, which stick to the older method, specify tire diameters of 32 and 33 inches, respectively.

From a silent second speed to a four-speed transmission, some one has said, is but a short, quick step. And it was said before Franklin took the short, quick step.

• • • •

Water transportation is involved in the designs of car insignia. The sails of the Plymouth name plate are unfurled in many a line of traffic and Reo's Flying Cloud pokes its prow down many a busy highway.

• • • •

Over in England, it seems, they have considerably more fun with their cars than in this country. One aspect of their enjoyment is making various speed tests. One of the favorites of this kind is to see how fast the car can get to a specific speed from a standing start. What brought the thing to mind was the delight of a Hupmobile eight owner, who found he could get 50 miles per hour from a standing start in 16 and 3-5 seconds.

Closed cars that have leather upholstery are not so numerous as to pass unnoticed. Willys-Knight's 70 is one that falls into this category.

DENDROLOGY DATA URGED ON PLANTER

Beautifier of Roads Should Know About Vines, Shrubs and Trees.

MEN BEING EDUCATED

Those persons who will be entrusted with the important work of beautifying the Nation's highways by the planting of growing things at their sides should have a wide and complete knowledge of vines, shrubs and trees. They should know the height and spread of the planting at maturity and its possibilities of contrast in shape, texture and color with other planting. Also, they should know what the planting looks like at different seasons of the year, and when and how to plant and how to care for all kinds of roadside development.

These points are emphasized by James H. Taylor, highway landscape supervisor of the Massachusetts Department of Public Works, writing on the progress of roadside planting in Public Roads, official bulletin of the United States Bureau of Public Roads.

"We are educating a small army of men whose primary interest is in the road surface and whose natural attention is to lines and grades, 'pot holes' and breaks, tar barrels and side drains, and interesting them in vines, shrubs and trees and to the esthetics of the roadside," writes Mr. Taylor. "Responses differ as men differ; the result is not uniform, but the general tone is one of splendid cooperation.

About "Pot Holes."

"Depressions in the road surfaces are known to the road maintenance man as 'pot holes.' The roadside developer detects what may be called pot holes in the highway landscape and corrects the situation, sometimes by filling in and sometimes by removing detracting or barrier material.

"All roadside pictures exist in three parts," says Mr. Taylor—"foreground, middle-distance and background. The planter must know the dimensional limits and contrastual possibilities in shape, texture and color; bark, leaf and flowers. He must know the spring aspect, summer maturity, autumn glory and winter value; in other words, he must have a complete knowledge of growing things.

"Trees carefully planted and cared for grow but tend to become top-heavy with foliage. This requires intelligent removal of enough of the tops to give them a chance to resist wind pressure, not by mere shortening of the terminals, which produces four or five sprouts instead of one, but by the removal of entire branches, cutting them off at the outer edge of the collar of the limb. Proper pruning leaves the tree symmetrical.

"In Massachusetts, three tree crews are kept in operation throughout the year, each crew consisting of a tree agent and three men. Two of the crews are equipped with a camp wagon—a small house on wheels—fitted to house four men comfortably.

Confined to New Roads.

"Plantings, in the main, are confined to new right-of-ways, since their widths of 60 feet or more allow greater opportunity for landscape development. Such locations assure a reasonably undisturbed future, but it is a rule in every case to plant as near the property line as possible."

The planting procedure, says Mr. Taylor, is as follows: A blue print showing the right-of-way lines and road location is sent to the Palmer station, where the State nursery is located. The designer makes a study of the road and indicates the proposed planting on the blue print. The locations of plants or trees are then staked and the pits dynamited, dug, and where necessary, refilled with the best loam obtainable. Tree pits are 3 feet in diameter and 3 feet deep and shrub pits are 2 feet in diameter and 2 feet deep. The planting order is filled by the State nursery, packed on trucks and trailers, and set out in the field. A space 3 feet in diameter around each plant is grubbed and kept free from weeds, and water is supplied if needed. After the planting is well started it is given a final inspection and turned over to the district maintenance forces for care.

"Trees should have constant and thorough inspection," says Mr. Taylor, "for it often happens that a tree, presenting a fair face to the road, is merely a shell from the other side and is ready to fall with the first strong wind. Dead trees and limbs deface the picture; they are a menace to traffic and should be removed at once."

Ammeter Will Tell If Stop Lights Are Lit

Stop lights are a fairly old story, but there always are new motorists to be informed concerning the easiest way of checking up on whether the light is working. It is not necessary to get out and walk around the car and look at the light while some one steps on the brake pedal. If the ammeter hand flickers when the brake is depressed it is a sign that the light is functioning. It is an easy check to make daily.

Early Use of Headlight Controls Aid to Driver

Those controls which operate the modern twin-beam headlight appeal to all as a great idea. It does happen, though, that many motorists fail to take full advan'_ge of them.

Through failure to notice the light beam, some drive through congested traffic with the beam raised, while others use the depressed ray on the open highway. Making the most use of the control while it still is a novelty makes the correct use of it a habit.

Gasoline Cleans Garage Floors.

When the garage floor becomes spotted with oil and grease that has leaked from the car, the garage owner comes face to face with another opportunity to use gasoline. As a cleaner in such a case, gasoline will remove more spots to the gallon than almost any other substance.

STATISTICS TALK

Our statistician reports:

That one motor car company uses 150,000 pounds of metal daily for the repair and replacement of worn-out production tools.

That a production of three-quarters of a car a day is quite exhilarating to the maker of the country's most expensive domestic passenger car.

That a manufacturer of an individualistic line of cars will be satisfied with a production of 6,000 cars this year.

That in sixteen years of manufacturing cars, one company has turned out 150,000 different parts.

Motoring With Mary

Every Revolution of the Engine Grinds Out Wisdom for the Woman Who Drives a Car, One of Them Has Discovered.

By MARY JANE MOORE

The Safety Features.

What are the safety features of an automobile?

I wonder how many car owners, like myself, would answer this question:

"Brakes, headlights and steering gear."

When I gave that answer to the traffic gen'us whom I met a few days ago, I was so certain that it was correct that my ire was aroused when it drew from him only a professional smile.

"Are you sure?" he asked.

"Certainly I am," I replied, although I knew from that moment I was far from sure. He seemed to know it, too.

"Well, he came back," that makes you just like the vast majority of motorists. I had hoped you might be quite a bit different. However, apart from that, how about tires as a safety feature?"

"Well, how about them?" I remarked, more petulantly now because Bob was listening in and I knew he would continue the discussion when we got home.

"And the horn," he went on. "Did you ever try to drive a car that had no horn or one that was not working? It is the most helpless feeling in the world. You can not pass the car ahead, must slow down at every corner even when you are absolutely certain that nothing is coming from the opposite direction, you must give cars parked along the way a wide berth lest any of them suddenly dart out into the street, and you must let pedestrians jay-walk as much as they please. Try to drive downtown some day, Mrs. Moore, without using your horn. I'll bet you will agree then that brakes, lights and steering are not the only safety features on the car."

"Then, there is the windshield cleaner. There's a safety feature for you. Under ordinary circumstances none of us seem to appreciate the safety of a good windshield wiper. Just get caught in a rainstorm some night and see what happens. I don't know of anything more terrifying. The windshield covered with water, crazily reflecting a thousand light rays. Why, one is totally blinded without a windshield wiper and nearly blinded in case the windshield wiper is only partially efficient."

He was absolutely right on the horn and windshield wiper. I saw it and mellowed considerably.

"But, to go back to tires——" I cut in, just to find out something of value.

"Well, I'll tell you briefly the story of a friend of mine who was trying to get 14,000 miles out of a set of tires. He was not penurious, but just thought that he was so near, he might as well go on to 14,000 miles. Well, one night a front tire blew and he went into a ditch. It cost him $36 to have the damage to the car repaired—all because he tried to get about $2 worth of mileage out of worn tires. No motorist who knew the safety features of his car would put off the job of having good tires at all times.

"To continue with other safety features, there is the rear-view mirror. Do you know that once rear-view mirrors were just accessories bought by those who could afford to add things to the car? Now they are compulsory equipment in every State which has a modern vehicle law. That is because they represent safety.

"It is all right to make brakes, headlights—and don't forget tail lights—and steering the basic features of safety in maintaining the car, but, at the same time, the other safety features should be at the peak of perfection. One simply must know what they are."

The Old Mechanic Says:

Whoever said "slips don't count" certainly didn't have in mind those relatin' to keepin' an eye on the instrument board.

The boys in the shop are workin' right now on the car of a man who knows a lot about automobiles and is one of the most enthusiastic advocates of a close watch on the instrument board. They're puttin' in a new connectin' rod bearin' and probably goin' to have to install a new oil pump before they get through. And all of it's due to the fact that this chap, who is a good driver if there ever was one, slipped up on watchin' the instrument board. That slip certainly counted against him financially.

The oil pump apparently had been "dead" for some time, to judge by the condition of the engine. The driver, however, was busy talkin' to a passenger in the seat with him, and for once his concentration on the instruments flagged. A thumpin' in the engine suddenly called it back again, but then it was too late. It nearly always is too late when there's somethin' wrong with the oil pump.

Slips of this kind are so needless. Droppin' the eye on the instrument board from time to time is such an easy thing to do. There are more instruments than ever before, but they are so simple to read, especially the more important ones like the oil gauge and the ammeter.

Instrument drivin' is an easy habit to cultivate. If a driver has not been in the habit of doin' it with the old car, it is not too late to start, especially when a new one should stimulate his interest in mechanics. Just a few days of payin' attention to what the instrument board is telling about how the engine is runnin' and the habit of lookin' at it will become a fixed one. It cuts down repairs.

Large Motor Plants Headed by Youngsters

One of the greatest figures in the motor world has expressed a preference for workers above the age of 35 years and has declared that he did not object to those over 60.

Consider the other side of the picture. One of the most successful manufacturers of eights is a company headed by a man of 36. Another company that has had a marked success in the past two years is headed by a man of 34. A third which is essaying a comeback at the moment recently elected as its president a youngster of 33.

It all depends on the point of view, and the point of view varies.

Motorists Going To New Brunswick

Province Has Cooperative Arrangement With Quebec on Tours.

As a result of a cooperative arrangement with the Province of Quebec, an increasing number of motor tourists are visiting New Brunswick, arriving from the former territory, according to reports fom Fredericton, N. B.

The opening of the Perron Boulevard around the coast of the Gaspe Peninsula is one factor responsible for increasing the tourist travel to New Brunswick through Quebec as hundreds of motoring parties visiting Gaspe Peninsula are extending their tour eastward so as to include visits to New Brunswick, while some proceed through the other maritime provinces.

Already a large percentage of the American parties making the Gaspe Peninsula tour are returning to the United States via New Brunswick and the New England States, while others are following the route through New Brunswick on their way to Gaspe.

DID YOU KNOW

That in the conventional four-speed transmission, the gearshift is standard? "Low" is latched out and is not used except for starting on a grade. The average start is made in second, which is located in the position of low gear on the three-speed gearset.

That the tool called a wrench on this side of the Atlantic is known in England as a "spanner?"

NEW SEDAN IS ADDED BY DODGE

Pictured here is the five-passenger, two-door sedan which has just been given a place in the Dodge family. It parallels other members in all mechanical and general body design features.

THAT USED CAR PROBLEM

"The used car problem."

How many times has the average citizen of this motorized country heard the phrase? And, how many times has he heard it as just so many words with no very definite idea of how much of a problem the used car actually was?

It was not so long ago that one of the popular priced car makers compiled some figures that threw some very definite light on the used car problem. The figures dealt with used car sales by the company's dealers for a one month period and they showed that during that time 157,624 used cars were placed in the hands of buyers.

The figure commands thought. It indicates something of the size of the sales job that confronts the automobile dealer. It reveals that for every new car he sells, he must sell pretty close to an average of one used car. Sometimes he sells more than one used car in order to dispose of one new one. For instance, a new car buyer comes in with a fairly good used car. He trades it in. Later, the dealer sells the used car, taking in still another less valuable car in trade. Then, later, he must dispose of that. In such an instance, he would have sold three cars in the process of selling one.

That is not an unusual experience by any means. Dealers could well wish it were.

It takes time to make sales and when it is necessary to make three sales in order to make one, it is evident that the car dealer is in quite an unusual situation as a merchandiser.

Bad Driving Habits Cause of Mishaps

Straightaway Highways, Even Well Paved, No Hindrance, Charge.

Most traffic accidents are caused by faulty driving habits on straightaway highways, according to an official of the traffic division of the Michigan State police. The statement is based on State records kept over a period of several months.

"Motorists who insist on taking up more than half the paved road cause many accidents," the official pointed out. Many accidents are due to incompetent drivers. Others are due to cutting through traffic recklessly or at excessive speed. We find less than 2.5 per cent of accidents due to faulty brakes. Thirteen per cent are due to faulty headlights."

Michigan now is carrying on a campaign to educate motorists on the subject of proper headlighting.

"In the near future," it is stated by the official quoted previously, "drivers who operate cars with faulty headlights will be arrested. If the headlight is correctly focused the beam should shine no higher than the bulb. By law, in Michigan, it is not necessary to dim one's lights and dimming is not necessary if lights are focused properly. If the driver is not sure on this point he should dim. To obtain the proper focus I recommend that the light rays come to a point no higher than the bulb at 100 feet distance from the car."

Batteries Need Attention.

The sun rises later and goes down more quickly these days. Batteries also go down more quickly unless they are given proper attention.

CHRYSLER

has now definitely raised motoring to a still higher plane. The difference in favor of the new Chryslers is decisive and overpowering. You must personally experience this new performance if you would be abreast of the times. Only by demonstration can you learn fully of the great new performance possibilities ushered in by the many characteristic new Chrysler features such as these:

MULTI-RANGE

—the new type of Chrysler gear shift by means of which the driver is able to dominate any modern traffic situation whether on the congested city streets, on the open highway, or in the mountains. You have nothing new to learn. Makes driving a joy; shifting, easy—sure—smooth. Engine, gas and oil are conserved while every previous limit of performance is far extended.

DOWN-DRAFT

—the new Chrysler carburetion principle which literally reverses previous fueling practice, with incredible gains in power, smoothness, surety, economy and accessibility. Not merely a gravity manifold, but the same scientific method of carburetion so successfully employed in many recent astonishing aviation endurance flights.

ARCHITONIC

—the new principles and methods of Architonic body construction give the new Chrysler bodies their aristocratic smartness and style, their "dreadnought" strength, permanent silence and restful riding qualities. Actually scores of such basic betterments await you in the new Chryslers!

NEW TIRE MARKINGS SHED LIGHT ON SIZE

Old Confusing System of Dual Sets of Figures Is Abandoned.

NEW METHOD EXPLAINED

Adoption of a new method of marking tires has done much to lift the mystery of just what the figures on a tire mean, according to B. J. Lemon, of the Society of Automotive Engineers. Under the new method of marking, only two figures, separated by a dash, are used, telling the dimension of the tire and removing any misunderstanding as to the tire's size.

As a result of this change, tires are now appearing on the market bearing only the new marking. For the past year they have carried two imprints, one the new and one the old style. Action taken by the Society of Automotive Engineers at its annual meeting at Saranac Lake, however, resulted in the elimination of the dual marking.

Under the new method, it is explained by Lemon, the first number means the tire's cross sectional dimension, while the second number is the diameter of the rim in inches.

For example, 5.00-19 means that the tire's cross section is approximately five inches while the rim's diameter is 19 inches. Under the old system the height of the tire from the road to the top was taken and used with the tire's cross section. Thus this same tire formerly was marked 29x5.00, meaning that the tire was 29 inches from the ground to its top and that the cross-section was 5 inches.

This old method, however, was inaccurate, owing to variation in different tires. Hence, action was taken by the S. A. E. to bring about a more accurate marking. This was done so that the automotive engineers might have a set standard of size in the selection of tires as every tire now marked is exact on its rim diameter.

In order to help the riding public, however, for some time the two markings were used on tires, the new one being in large figures and the old one in smaller ones directly underneath. For example, the 5.00-19 tire bore these figures in large type, with 29x5.00 underneath in smaller figures.

After a year of this confusing system of marking, the Society of Automotive Engineers standard committee, at its annual meeting in Saranac Lake, took action to eliminate the dual marking, while similar action was taken by the Tire and Rim Association, Inc., at a meeting at Jackson, Mich. Action of the S. A. E., while tentative, is expected to be ratified at a fall meeting of the tire and rim division of the standards committee in Detroit.

"This action," says Lemon, "goes a long way toward clearing up the standardization of tire sizes and the avoidance of confusion in the marking. For a year the general public has been subjected to confusion through the dual marking of tires and it now seems best that just the one marking be used. The new method is far simpler than the old one and is easily understood by the general public. All in all, it marks a step forward in what we are constantly striving at in the tire industry—standardization and simplification."

Gauge Correction Possible.

If the gasoline gauge does not register accurately, it still may be consistent in its inaccuracy. In such a case, it is easy to correct the gauge if one knows the average margin of error.

VIGOROUS RENAISSANCE ENJOYED BY TOURING CAR

The "come-back" of the touring car body type is an interesting current development in the motor world. Illustrated here is the model just added by Lincoln. It is similar in all mechanical and general design respects to other cars in the line.

Foreign Transport Experts Study Here

Some Are Also in United States to Make Automotive Purchases.

Announcement is made by the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce of the presence in this country of five foreign leaders in motor transport work abroad. These men are here either to make purchases or to study various phases of the American automotive industry.

Erich E. Walter, representing a firm of importers at Hamburg, is here to negotiate a large scale purchase of equipment for his company. As agents for the Polish government they wish to buy a number of gasoline-driven rail locomotives and passenger cars, which will be substituted for steam train service on unprofitable branch railroad lines in Poland.

George Hauser, secretary to the chief technical manager of the Skoda Works, at Prague, the largest automobile manufacturing plant in Czechoslovakia, has made a tour of investigation of different automobile plans in this country. H. M. Zentzytaki, of Berlin, writer of articles on automotive topics in many of the leading European newspapers, is here to study the development of bus and truck transportation.

H. F. Witzer, representing Hanko, G. m. b. H., automobile distributors of Coblenz and Berlin, and a member of one of the leading German financing companies, is inspecting methods of production, distribution and financing which are adaptable to German conditions. Nelson Rounsevell, proprietor of the Panama American, of Panama City, is paying especial attention to highway connections between the United States and Latin republics.

Visitor Mistakes Red Light For Fire Signal—Crash

"But, officer, I did not see the light. At home the lights are located above the middle of the intersection. I'm accustomed to looking for them there."

How many times have these words or others to the same effect been uttered this summer as the great migration of motor travelers fills every city and town with strangers all day and most of the night! How they exemplify th need for uniformity in traffic regulation through dealing with but one small phase of the total subject!

In Washington recently a woman driver from a Middle Western city figured in a mishap that seriously damaged both cars, but fortunately resulted in no personal injuries. It was a light-controlled intersection, and the red light was against her. She saw the red light, she admitted. It was located on a post, about 12 feet high, across the intersection.

Back home, she declared, that could not have been anything other than a fire alarm box signal. They locate their traffic lights, out there, in the middle of the intersection and suspended about 18 feet above the street.

The accident happened at night just as a great many accidents do. The red light was just a red light, and she thought it was a fire alarm signal.

The mishap, according to traffic records, is typical of many. Motorists get accustomed to seeing traffic lights in certain places at the intersection. In any other position they fail to see them. Failure, in such a case, is a tremendously dangerous proposition.

It is something that the vast army of tourists will return home this fall thinking that "something ought to be done about it." That is the first step toward uniformity.

Flywheel Speed Of Boat Tested

Burst at 12,000 Evolutions With Loud Report and Many Pieces.

Amateur sailors often have wondered and usually not a little anxiously about the exact speed at which the flywheel of a motor boat engine will burst and what it would do at that moment. That the deep forebodings which have assailed nervous landlubbers concerning such an event are somewhat justified is suggested by J. E. Wilkinson. He described an experiment undertaken to satisfy the curious on this hitherto moot point:

As the first step, a safe place was selected; a box was constructed of wood, using sides 4 inches thick and surrounded by several tons of coal; a flywheel made of aluminum alloy was placed in the center, and a suitable method was used to indicate the revolutions per minute of the flywheel.

At 9,000 revolutions per minute it ran very smoothly; at about 12,000 the flywheel could be seen, from a platform above, to grow larger. Next, there came a loud report, like that of a gun, when the flywheel broke into pieces of all sizes and shapes. Most of the pieces were never found; some penetrated the sides of the box and were lost in the coal.

Record Auto Key Numbers.

Now that each car has its individual set of keys, it is more important than ever that the owner follow that old but wise counsel to make a record of key numbers. On some lines it means the replacement of locks when the keys are lost.

Copying the local traffic is one way to get pleasantly through a strange city.

Liquid Top Dressings Are Likely to Spatter

These liquid top dressings which are so essential to the preservation of the top are generally easy and quick to apply. There is one point, however, that might well be recognized in advance of starting the job; namely, that the liquid is light and is likely to spatter over the body of the car unless it is applied carefully. It is not difficult to remove but a little care with the brush will prevent a later expense of energy in cleaning.

A steady, fairly high speed makes for better time than one that is alternately fast and slow.

Front-Drive Auto Test To Be Made Here Today

Washington motorists who have heard about front drive automobiles but have never had the opportunty of seeing them in action will have their curiosity satisfied at the Congressional Airport, on the Rockville Pike, today. Throughout the day C. H. Warrington, Cord and Auburn distributor here, will sponsor a demonstration of the new Cord front drive automobile. At the same time a flying show will be staged.

Nothing Newer than Today's Hudson

The most advanced performance combined with finest modern mechanical achievements of the industry. Newest fall color styles, in the widest variety, newest in appearance, style and appointment. And with unchallenged value and PRICE ADVANTAGE.

The greatness of Hudson values is expressed with unparalleled power in the way its NEWNESS stands out among the Newest and Latest models the industry offers.

Here we find feature after feature of Hudson's origination, now offered in the new models of the more expensive cars.

Here we find, featured as new, such advantages as radiator shutters—first introduced and for years standard with Hudson.

Here we find Hudson type brakes, Hudson type shock absorbers. Counterbalanced crankshafts are much to the fore, which seek to approximate the efficiency and smoothness of the Super-Six principle.

Yet they miss the essence of that value because patents prevent copying.

Thousands, who have examined the latest makes come away with the conclusion that there is nothing newer than today's Hudson.

And it retains scores of advantages that are as far ahead of the industry as ever.

Nothing has been produced to touch its value and price advantage. It is still the master car in performance and reliability. Its smoothness and great roadability are still exclusive to Hudson. Its riding comfort is chiefly due to its own type of suspension which is patented and can be shared by no other maker.

And Hudson still is alone in offering the almost individual distinction of such wide color choices, at no extra cost. See and examine the new offerings of other makers by all means. Then come, compare and drive the Greater Hudson. You, too, must feel the spontaneous enthusiasm that has rolled up a landslide approval for its beauty, quality and value—expressed in sales that for the first seven months of 1929 exceed the total of the entire year preceding.

EXPERTS TO TACKLE AIRPORT PROBLEMS

Aviation Leaders and Road-builders Plan Joint Conference Here.

DETAILS OF PROGRAM

Aviation leaders from all parts of the country are expected to attend the municipal airport conference to be held in Washington October 24 and 25 jointly by the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce and the American Road Builders Association. Subjects of vital interest to airport executives especially are the basis of the program as arranged by the two sponsoring organizations.

"The growth of aviation has been so rapid and spectacular that its leaders are only just now turning their attention to its very foundation stone, the landing fields for air traffic," declares Maj. Donald A. Davison, chairman of the municipal airports committee, city officials' division, American Road Builders Association. Maj. Davison is arranging the conference with the assistance of a committee named by the two co-operating organizations.

Col. H. H. Blee, chief of the airports division, Department of Commerce, will preside over the business sessions. Experienced men will present papers on the various topics, and general discussion will follow, to bring out the ideas of the conference membership.

Maj. Frederic A. Reimer, president of the American Road Builders Association, will preside at the luncheon October 24, which follows the morning registration and assembly of delegates.

More than 10,000 invitations have been sent to city and county officials affiliated with the Road Builders, members of the Aeronautical Chamber, and others officially connected with airports.

The first subject, "Airport Layout and Planning," will be discussed by B. Russell Shaw, of St. Louis, Mo. "Airport Drainage" will be handled by C. A. Hogentogler, senior engineer, Bureau of Public Roads, and "Airport Surfaces" will be discussed by C. N. Conner, engineer executive, American Road Builders Association. A. P. Taliaferro, jr., chief field service section, aeronautics branch of the Department of Commerce, has accepted an invitation to present a paper on "Airport Management."

One of the most important papers of the conference is expected in "Airports and Public Parks," which is to be given by Lieut. Col. U. S. Grant 3d. Another highlight of the two-day gathering will be the paper on "European Practices," which will be presented by Col. Charles M. Young, who assumes the office of Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Aeronautics October 1.

NEW U. S. DIRIGIBLES TO BE MODEL CRAFT

a transoceanic dirigible service was to become a reality, comforts comparable to those of the best steamships must be offered. The type of construction made possible by the use of helium is the only one at present offering the promise of such comforts, dirigible enthusiasts point out.

One of the most progressive features of the Graf Zeppelin, the use of fuel gas rather than gasoline, will be incorporated in the American dirigibles. Again, by virtue of the use of helium, it will be used to better advantage. In the case of the German craft, the lower one-third of the big bag is filled with fuel cells, while the remainder is given over to hydrogen or lifting cells. Instead of being built below the lifting-gas cells as in the case of the Graf, the fuel cells of the Navy's dirigibles will be located between two of the former.

In this fashion the inflammable fuel cells will be surrounded by cells of noninflammable gas. In addition to providing safe fuel storage facilities, such a method of cell structure provides accessibility to the entire metal ring of the dirigible. Another advantage claimed for it is that the likelihood of the lifting gas being rendered impure by the escape of the fuel gas.

Avoids Ballast Machinery.

The use of a gaseous fuel in combination with a small amount of liquid gasoline rather than employing a fuel entirely of the latter type will be especially advantageous with helium as the inflating medium. Of the same weight as air, it will not be necessary to install in the ship elaborate machinery for the recovery of water ballast or to valve away costly helium, as the fuel supply diminishes. In the case of a liquid fuel, weighing in the vicinity of six pounds to the gallon, it is necessary either to recover water ballast or valve lifting gas as a restriction upon the lift of the dirigible.

The fuel-gas, helium-inflated dirigible will have the virtue of being able to soar to greater heights, a consideration of importance to the commercial employment of these craft. If they are to climb over mountains and fly above storms—and they must in commerce—they will have to have a higher ceiling. That is an assured characteristic of the dirigibles now being built in this country.

The construction of the American dirigibles is such that, unlike the Graf Zeppelin, no wire bracing is necessary for stiffening the rings which make up the structure. Such wire netting as is used is merely for the purpose of holding the gas cells in place and this is so designed as to assure that the cell fabric will not be chafed.

Proof Against Storms.

As to the sturdiness of the type of hull structure that is employed in the later airships, it is obvious that the fate of the Shenandoah, the first large American-built dirigible, was borne significantly in mind. Squalls and storms, such as those which impeded the progress of the Graf on her first westward voyage over the Atlantic, are insignificant as compared with those for which the newer craft will be prepared. Gust of air traveling perpendicularly at a rate of 60 feet feet per second, among the rarest of phenomena, will do nothing harmful to the huge craft.

The power system of the American dirigibles will represent a considerable advance over that of the Graf Zeppelin. There will be eight engines of 600 horsepower each. These will be installed each in a separate room inside the hull. Rigid drivemasts extending outside the hull will carry the propellers, the arrangement of which constitutes one of the most interesting developments in airship building.

The axes of the propellers, by means of fairly simple gears, may be tilted 90 degrees. This means that in addition to giving the ship forward and reverse motion the engines can be used to lift the huge craft, supplementing the power of the gas in the cells.

The American ships, earlier than the famous Graf Zeppelin, are expected to be the foundation upon which the commercial dirigible of the future will be built. It will be the dirigible of which Count Zeppelin dreamed when he foresaw his creation a really valuable factor in world commerce, his successors say.

Closed-Cabin Type Of Plane Preferred

Aviation Industry Meeting With Same Demand Auto Men Met.

That purchasers of aircraft for private purposes are showing a decided preference for the closed cabin type of plane, is stated by an official of a large aircraft manufacturing company on the basis of a three months' survey.

The aviation industry, it is pointed out, is experiencing the same reaction that the automobile manufacturers noted a few years ago, when a noticeable trend toward the closed type of car made it the most popular of all models.

Comfort while flying and shelter from wind and temperature exposures are sought by private owners, it is further stated. Compactness and lightness of weight, with the necessary maximum of safety, appeal in body designs, while economy of operation and maintenance are among the important points influencing the private purchaser, according to the survey.

Air Line Has Fine Safety Record.

More than 3,000,000 miles have been flown by one large air transport company without a passenger ever having been injured.

Comfort Provided For Truck Driver

New Commercial Vehicle Features De Luxe Innovation.

The esthetic sense of the commercial vehicle driver is decidedly pleased with the deluxing of the body of this type of motor car. But that is only half of the story.

The other half, which the truck driver rates as more important, is that comfort has been proportionately deluxed in most of these cars. There was a time, not so long ago, when a day behind the wheel of a truck or commercial vehicle was just plain heavy work. Today, however, they are more like passenger cars, with scientifically angled seats, better upholstery over saddle springs, adjustable seats, four-wheel easy operating brakes, effortless steering and the like.

The variety of comfort that the commercial vehicle driver prefers is that which has been deluxed.

Bomb Plane 72 Feet Spread.

A new English bombing plane with a wing spread of 72 feet, gasoline capacity of 230 gallons, space for a crew of three, a military load of 1,580 pounds and motored with twin engines, is under production, according to British military officials.

Along the Airways

Aviation's Problems and Progress in Panorama.

By AYER RYDER

But It's Worth It.

"That's a high fare to pay for just a mile or two of travel," commented an airman's wife upon noting the price of $300 to $350 for parachutes of a certain widely known make.

"But that mile or two is invariably the most important ride any one ever took," replied her husband. "The fare is not too nigh viewed in that light."

It Differs in Planes.

Motorists who have refused to believe the statement of experts that it is essential to change spark plugs every 10,000 miles—or at least advisable to do it—are going to find the expert right when they start flying their own planes. Engine performance is much more important when the vehicle has no definite relation to the ground, and that spark plugs play a greater part in this performance dawns quite quickly upon the airman.

Another thing about plugs that will be learned when the public goes into aviation for itself is that there really is a tremendous difference between plugs—that the one that works properly under one set of conditions may be very poor under another type of service.

Speed Often Needed.

Slow landings are safest under most but not all conditions of flying. They usually are safer because of two things; namely, they minimize the shock upon the landing gear and shorten the run necessary after landing. However, when the plane is proceeding slowly in the air it is much harder to handle if the air is gusty. In such a case, many pilots prefer to land at a higher speed.

Inspection Cost High.

When one is acquainted with the numerous inspection operations in the factory which builds airplanes, engines or parts, the price of the product is less surprising. From the raw material to the finished product, every part that goes into the engine is checked and rechecked until it would seem that inspection comprised the greatest cost factor in the production of the engine or the total plane.

An interesting feature of inspection in many aircraft factories is that it is under the chief engineer rather than the factory manager, as in the majority of industries.

Airplane Is Used In Sowing of Rice

Blast of Propeller Does the Spreading; Five Sacks a Minute.

Two new methods of adapting the airplane to industrial and health needs are reported by the American Air Transport Association.

At a speed of 75 miles an hour a California pilot sowed five sacks of rice in a minute in the San Juan Valley rice paddies.

Flying at a height of 200 feet the pilot shot the seed from a special sower built into the front cockpit, the blast of the propeller doing the spreading. A thousand acres were sown in a fraction of the time which would have been required by ground workers.

As a preliminary test to the start of operations in this country, the Government recently enlisted planes to fight the mosquito in Haiti. Swamp land was sprayed by a solution of two-thirds lime and one-third paris green with most benecial results.

WASHINGTON: SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1929. M

New Ambassador Hotel, Creation Of Cafritz, Will Open Today

MODERNISTIC in design and expressing the latest ideas in hotel appointments and conveniences, The Ambassador, Washington's smart new 12-story hotel at 14th and K Streets Northwest, will open today. Planned along new lines and introducing a club atmosphere with many unique features, The Ambassador is apace of the requirements of our times. Beautifully appointed lobbies with luxurious furnishings, private men's and women's lounges, main dining room offering an excellent cuisine, and cafeteria with appetizing food at moderate prices, serve the convenience of guests. The largest and most beautiful indoor swimming pool with water purified by the Ultra-Violet Ray System, the finest health club south of New York with all modern equipment and the latest methods for keeping men physically fit, offer the opportunity for recreation and exercise.

The Ambassador contains 500 rooms in one, two and three room suites, elegantly furnished in the modern manner with radio loud speaker in every room connected with the central control station on the roof of the building, permitting the guests the choice of two programs. There are many other features that one will want to see, so the hotel will be open for public inspection today. There will be music, and one will have the opportunity of making a complete tour of the building.

AMBASSADOR WILL HAVE HEALTH CLUB

Feature of Hotel Will Be Under the Direction of Physical Expert.

TREATMENT IS PROVIDED

A unique feature of the Ambassador Hotel is the Health Club, the scientific means employed nowadays by professional men, bankers and business executives in keeping fit.

Ranking above every other possession on earth is the one thing upon which the enjoyment of all others depend—perfect health. It means unlimited vitality and the capacity for endless work without feeling tired. It means exuberant spirits and a pleasing, forceful and magnetic personality. It means a clear head and an active mind. In business, in society and in sport, the man who is physically fit becomes the outstanding leader. Not only does he accomplish more, but he enjoys life more. The swift pace of today and the economic complexities of modern life make demands to a greater extent than ever before on the energy of the business man. Keen competition forces him to spend long hours at his work, to the consequent neglect of his physical well-being. He often feels drowsy and tired, and has periods when accomplishment seems to lag, and notes his lack of pep and energy. These men, through neglect to care for themselves, lessen their efficiency and rob themselves of the enjoyment of the mental and physical health which may easily be theirs.

The Health Club constitutes a course of treatments, including sunlight, exercises, electric cabinets, massage and hydrotherapy to insure proper functioning of the vital organs of the body and to build up health, giving its members in the brief period of one hour results commensurate with those that might be obtained by many hours of exercise.

From Many Cities.

Harry M. Adams, director of the Health Club, brings to the members a varied and large experience in this type of work in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, in some of the most prominent institutions of the country. The Ambassador Health Club, designed and equipped under his personal supervision, is one of the finest establishments of its kind south of New York.

In order to insure the desired results, the course of treatment for each member is fitted to his individual needs. Before the first treatment is given, a thorough physical examination is made by the staff physician, and it is upon these findings that the course of treatment is determined. Each member of the Health Club is given the personal attention of a skilled attendant, who accompanies him through the prescribed routine to see that the desired beneficial effects of the treatment are obtained. He is also entitled to the use of the swimming pool and handball courts, provided his physical condition permits their use.

Mr. Adams has selected with care his staff for the Ambassador Health Club. These attendants are carefully trained and have been chosen on account of their interest and efficiency in this work.

Given Sun Treatment.

Each member is placed in care of a personal attendant, who conducts him to an individual locker, where he changes from street clothes to sterilized trunks. First, he is given the beneficial rays of the sun lamps; then a series of exercises with his attendant, to offer the resistance and maintain tissue-building movements equal in effectiveness to hours of ordinary exercise. If his course so prescribes he may ride one of the electric horses, make use of the health builder or rowing machine or enter into a round of blood-quickening handball; or an electric cabinet bath may be indulged in, which induces free perspiration and removes toxic poisons from the pores.

In the sun-ray treatments of the Ambassador Health Club the whole body is exposed to the ultraviolet rays and a warm current of air continually flows over the body. This treatment requires about one-fifth the time it would take to expose oneself to the natural sunlight for the same results.

If resistance exercises are prescribed, an expert instructor accompanies the member through the man-to-man exercises suited to his particular needs, followed by deep-breathing which supplies blood to the muscles and cells of the body with increased oxygen. In connection with this treatment, the member can enjoy an invigorating and refreshing swim in the Ambassador pool, where the water is purified by the ultraviolet ray system (no chlorine is used) and heated to the proper temperature for the season.

Cabinets Eliminate Poisons.

Too much can not be said in favor of the electric cabinets which are used in eliminating poisons from the system, a treatment which may be taken at the Health Club for chronic rheumatism, gout, diabetes, abnormal blood pressure, intestinal autointoxication and neuritis. A few minutes in one of these cabinets will cause one to perspire freely and the pores will give up the impurities and poisons that are stored in them. The cabinets are also of great value in reducing superfluous flesh. From the cabinet the member steps into a private compartment where a dash of warm water is poured over him and he enjoys that first glow. The trained fingers of an expert masseur manipulate the muscles and flesh as they travel over the vital organs of his body and massage them until he feels the joy of youth, the heritage of every man who gives nature half a chance. The attendant finishes his work with a brisk rub of sea salt that makes his body tingle and his skin glow with color.

The methods of massage employed at the Health Club increase the blood supply to the vital organs, improve digestion, clear up congestion, relieve insomnia, and build up healthy tissue. Following the massage comes the douche, a stream of alternating water directed at the nerve centers, which scientifically applied, is one of nature's greatest health-giving forces. The douche has no equal as a general awakener, invigorator, regulator of nutrition, and as a curative power in chronic dyspepsia, insomnia, congestion of the liver, stomach, spleen and intestines.

Overwrought nerves respond to the soothing influences of certain phases of the farm water type of hydrotherapy. Faded bodies brace up under the blood-tingling stimulation of the cool nozzle that causes every cell in the body to awaken. From the simple shower to the Scotch douche, each variation of hydrotherapy plays a definite part in the prescribed course. After the douches come a brisk alcohol rub-down, then the member is allowed to relax and rest on a soft lounge in quiet surroundings.

Handball is just one of the forms of exercise used at the Ambassador Health Club for the development of speed, endurance and strong lung 500 Rooms Have Every Comfort and Convenience Modern Requirement Can Ask; Arranged in Suites of One, Two and Three Rooms; Lingerie Laundry.

MODERN indeed is the word that typifies the Ambassador Hotel, Washington's smart new 12-story fireproof hotel, embodying many distinct features of comfort and convenience to meet the requirements of today. Changing conditions and rapidity with which new developments are brought about have caused a rapid and extremely satisfactory adjustment of life to meet these new conditions. The tempo of today has been keyed up considerably over that of previous times to meet the requirements of a new age. The element of speed has entered into the life of today, and in order that one may achieve he is constantly confronted with the necessity of saving as much time as possible so that he may complete his program. This new era has made it increasingly difficult for one to satisfy all of the demands made on his time in the interest of business, pleasure and health.

The Ambassador Hotel offers a distinctive residence with the appointments service and convenience of a hotel, combined with the facilities of an exclusive club, and offers its guests a charming and restful environment with many delightful opportunities for entertainment and recreation.

Conveniently located at Fourteenth and K streets northwest, opposite beautiful Franklin Park, in the downtown section of the city, it is smartly in the center of things, close to the metropolitan district with its shops, offices and financial institutions. The Ambassador Hotel enjoys a proximity to the principal Government departments is adequately served by bus and street car transportation and but a short distance from Potomac Park with its many facilities for golf, tennis and other outdoor sports.

Before the plans for the Ambassador Hotel were drawn, a detailed study was made by architects and engineers of a large number of the most modern hotels in the Eastern United States, so that the most up-to-date features of design, construction, appointments and equipment might be utilized. In keeping with the trend of the times, the modern was decided upon as the keynote to influence architecture as well as interior decoration.

In harmony with the modern idea, the architectural treatment carried throughout is very striking. This beautiful building has a flat facade of sharply contrasting Indiana limestone and burt orange brick, and is relieved by an interesting arrangement of flanking pylons and massive pilasters, separated by spandrels of variegated brick and richly veined marble, and capped by a boldly carved limestone parapet. The flatness of the elevation reflects the modern trend, but the monotony is avoided by the ornamental brick balcony and the courses of stone with geometric designs. A beautiful two-story arched entrance with quaintly carved woodwork, modernistic hanging lamp and ornamental bracket lamps afford a most inviting approach.

The interior design of the Ambassador Hotel is marked by the splendid use of space and the convenient arrangement of public rooms, as well as the many unusual service features One enters directly the main lobby, where the front desk is located. On this floor are also the manager's office, accounting department and cigar stand. The main dining room, extending from this lobby to Fourteenth street, has an inside entrance, and also a street entrance. Here, in a charming modernistic atmosphere, appetizing menus prepared by the Ambassador chef, and served with faultless excellence, may be had for breakfast, luncheon, dinner and supper, featuring special table d hote. China, glass and Derigold tableware carry out harmoniously the modernistic effect.

At the end of the lobby are the passenger elevators, and to the right the entrance to the commodious and luxurious main lounge, with its beautiful modern treatment. Adjoining is another spacious lounge which serves the purpose also of a ballroom for social functions. One of the two kitchens adjoins the main dining room on this floor. On both Fourteenth street and K street there are stores.

On the mezzanine floor one finds the beautifully appointed, club-like men's lounge with lavatory, and the charming women's lounge and powder puff with adjoining lavatory, an excellent cafeteria with its kitchen, offering a large number of dishes at moderate prices, prepared by the Ambassador Food Service, which is open for breakfast, luncheon and dinner. Adjoining the cafeteria are the private dining rooms, available for ladies' luncheons and private parties, and a game room with provisions for serving refreshments. There also are a number of suites reserved for professional and business offices. Public telephone booths are located on this floor and also adjoining the main lounge. On the mezzanine balcony, overlooking the two-story lounge, are the writing rooms and also the four-position switchboard.

On the basement floor is the elevator lounge, leading into the Health Club, with its many rooms devoted to the phases of scientific treatment for keeping business and professional men fit, including the latest physical therapy equipment and mechanical apparatus, and the entrance to the swimming pool balcony with the registry desk, where bathing equipment is obtained. The women's locker room is entered from this floor. On this balcony, surrounding the pool on three sides are tables where refreshments are served and visitors may watch the bathers.

The valet department for serving guests of the hotel is located on this floor, also, as well as the rooms housing the ventilating equipment, which supplies warm or cool air, according to the season, to all public spaces in the hotel. All air brought into the hotel by this system is washed and purified, and in addition to this equipment there is a ventilating device on the roof of the building which draws out the foul air, thus assuring a constant circulation of clean, fresh air.

On the subbasement floor is the swimming pool with its violet-ray purifying apparatus, with its circulating system and filter tanks, dressing rooms for men, with individual steel lockers and showers, and the large, airy handball court of regulation size two stories high. The refrigeration system which supplies ice water throughout the hotel and the ice plant used by the Ambassador Food Service is also on this floor. The rest of the subbasement will be devoted entirely to mechanical equipment and service rooms for operating the hotel. The mechanical equipment includes the plant for heating the building and furnishing steam heat to the kitchens and the Health Club.

On the ten floors above the mezzanine in the Ambassador Hotel there are 500 guest chambers arranged in suites of one, two and three rooms for the accommodation of permanent and transient guests, equipped with many novel features and beautifully appointed in the modern manner, with complete hotel service. These rooms are all papered in specially designed wall paper and have modernistic carpets and draperies in rich color harmonies. The attractive walnut furniture is also of modernistic design, and the rooms have electric fans and floor lamps. Some of the guest rooms are equipped with dresser, bed, easy chairs and regulation bedroom equipment, while others are furnished with living-room suites and in-a-door beds, thus giving the guests the benefits of a living room with the comforts of a bedroom.

The Ambassador is the first Washington hotel to have radio loud speakers in every room. This equipment, with control switch permitting the reception of two programs rebroadcast from a central station on the roof of the building is built into a specially designed writing desk with beveled glass top.

The baths, with black and white tile walls and floors and the latest colored porcelain fixtures, built-in tubs and showers, are constantly supplied with fresh air by the latest improved mechanical ventilators.

In the corridors on each floor throughout the building are mail chutes, drinking fountains with running ice water and public toilets.

On the sixth floor of the hotel is the lingerie laundry for the convenience of women guests, equipped with porcelain sinks, driers, ironing boards and electric irons.

Pleasing Color Harmony Marks Ambassador Hotel

Decorations and Furnishings of the Hotel Emphasize Modern Trend; Lobbies and Lounges Different But Beautiful; Artistic Textured Walls.

MODERN, in its interior decoration and appointments, the Ambassador Hotel sounds a new note in luxurious comfort and convenience. In the beautiful lobbies, the men's and women's private lounges, dining room, cafeteria, swimming pool and health club, as well as the charming suites, one is conscious of something indescribably different. Here one finds in an expression of modern art the richest color combinations of beautiful carpets woven from special designs, and furniture and lamps selected from the leading shops in the United States and France, masterpieces of the cabinet makers' art. A large number of upholstery patterns used on furniture in the same room afford an unusual treatment which combine pleasingly in carrying out the predominant note. In the treatment of public spaces, the Cafritz Co. has given much attention to the careful selection of artistic textured walls, and the predominating colors carried throughout are rose, taupe, mulberry, sand and maroon.

Lobby.

As the guests enter the main lobby, they will at once be impressed with the magnificently carved and paneled doors, terrazo floor with gorgeous modern rugs, specially designed lighting fixtures, and textured walls, troweled and lined in a modern adaptation of travertine. The cornices are in a quiet effect of neutral tones touched with gold. The cabinets, consoles, sofas, tables and chairs in the lobby are all of inlaid woods of the most modern design, with mirrors, floor lamps and ornaments expressing the art of today.

Main Dining Room and Cafeteria.

The main dining room wall treatment is a combination of texture and flat surfaces in various shades of orange trimmed in black. The furniture is black and draperies of orange and black. The table service is of the latest Deri-Gold, used for the first time in Washington for hotel service. The china and glassware is unusually distinctive, having been especially designed for this hotel. The cafeteria walls are treated in a basket-weave effect and the wall fixtures and woodwork carried out in light tan and orange.

Main Lounge and Ballroom.

In the main lounge and ball room the walls are textured in colored sands in harmonious effects of greens and light browns in modernistic design, created especially for these rooms. The pilasters and capitals are high-lighted and glazed in orange, while the woodwork is of white glazed to blend with the walls. The very unusual treatment of the casement windows in the main lounge and ballroom adjoining is a distinctive feature. Here the architect has adapted the use of opaque glass, which materially improves the color effect and at the same time gives a soft light to the room. The furnishings of the ballroom are of large, comfortable pieces selected with a view to comfort as well as beauty, and the woods employed, as well as fabrics, were largely selected from abroad. Each piece of furniture is a treasured example of a furniture builder's master appreciation of the modern art of today. The fabrics used are tapestries, silk damasks and plushes, carried out in shades of mulberry, rose taupe and a dash of orange. The chandeliers are copied from a French design and

SELECTED WITH CARE

In the selection of contractors and materials for the building of the Ambassador Hotel, the greatest care was exercised so that everything entering into this beautiful new building would be of highest grade, in keeping with the character of the structure, and offering to the traveling public the latest and best hotel construction. Firms were considered on the basis of their reliability and past performances so that no unnecessary delay would hinder the completion of the building at the desired time. Materials were selected for beauty and wearing qualities. Many of the features and much of the equipment of the Ambassador Hotel are entirely different from anything that has been installed before. The cooperation and research of these companies have achieved most pleasing results in every instance.

The plans for the Ambassador Hotel were drawn by Harvey H. Warwick, Washington architect, who has had wide experience in the design of many prominent Washington structures. The Cafritz Construction Co. was the general contractor of the building.

All face and common brick in the Ambassador Hotel was furnished by the United Clay Products Co.; the ornamental limestone, as well as the limestone window sills were furnished by William B. Gibb and were put in place by Carl Iver Johnson, stone setter. The Washington Concrete Products Co. supplied all of the cinder block used on the job, and Fries, Beall & Sharp furnished the 3x4 gypsum block used.

Guaranteed Sand and Cement.

In the reinforced concrete construction Wells Steels Forms were furnished by the Washington Steel Form Co., the sand and gravel by the Columbia Sand & Gravel Corporation, and the Griffith Consumers Co. supplied all of the cement used. Structural steel and reinforcing steel was let to the Rosslyn Steel & Cement Co.

Careful consideration was given to the matter of waterproofing the outside walls of the hotel. The contract for waterproofing foundation walls was given to the Western Waterproofing Co., of Philadelphia, while the walls above the street level were dampproofed by the Washington Ply-Rite Co.

Steel lintels and window supports came from Barber & Ross, while the contract for the steel casement windows was given to the Genfire Steel Co., of Youngstown, Ohio.

The slag roofing of the Ambassador Hotel was applied by the Warren-Ehret Roofing Co., and all sheet metal work was done by Daly Bros.

All rough lumber was supplied by Galliher & Huguely, Inc., and all millwork and finishing hardware by Barber & Ross. Bruce flooring used was furnished by W. T. Galliher & Bro.

The plumbing work throughout the building was installed by D. H. Alsop. The modern note of the hotel is even carried into the bathrooms, with their colored basins and fixtures that were furnished by the Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co. An attractive feature of each bathroom is the set-in cabinet, furnished by the United Metal Box Co., of New York. The cabinets cater to the comfort of the guest with coat hooks, bottle openers and a built-in electric light above the cabinet. The Bathroom Specialty Co. of Trenton, N. J., supplied the built-in soap dishes, towel bars and paper holders.

Did Heating Work.

D. H. Alsop also did all of the heating work for the hotel. The Detroit Stoker Co., of Detroit, Mich., furnished the three large coal burners that are to be used in the heating of the building. Radiators were supplied by the American Radiator Co.

Much attention was given to the ventilating system put in the hotel. Daly Bros., of this city, installed the equipment, and the B. F. Sturtevant Co. and the Reed Air Filter Co. were responsible for the apparatus used.

All plaster work, as well as cornices and ornamental work, were done by Joseph Lozupone & Co., of this city.

All tile work throughout the building, as well as the marble stairways and terrazo work, was done by Joseph Antonelli, a large contractor from New York, who has done work in some of the largest buildings of that city.

Lectric Joe installed the electrical equipment for the entire building, wiring for all power machinery used in the cafeteria and kitchens for the main dining room, outlets for electric fans in each room, the large searchlights that are to be used as underwater illumination in the swimming pool, and the anunciator and alarm system installed.

Supplied Passenger Elevators.

Two high speed gearless passenger elevators, as well as the electric elevator, were installed by the Atlantic Elevator, and the elevator inclosures throughout the building were furnished by the Reliance Freproof Door Co. Mail chutes on each floor, manufactured and installed by the Cutler Mail Chute Co., serve the convenience of guests of the hotel.

The Ambassador swimming pool, the most beautiful indoor pool in the city, is lined with a white tile, bordered with ornamental work, furnished and set by the William H. Jackson Co., of New York City. The water pumped into the pool at the rate of 175 gallons per minute is purified by the R. U. V. ultra-violet ray system. This means that the pool is fed with 12,000 gallons of pure, sparkling, wholesome, drinking water each hour. This process does not add to the water any chemical, germicide or other element that would irritate the skin, eyes, nose or mucous membranes of bathers. This purifying system was furnished and installed by the R. U. V. Co., of New York, who have installed this system in the largest pools of the United States. In the immaculate dressing and locker rooms for men and women adjoining the pool, the individual steel lockers were purchased from the Durabilt Steel Locker Co., of Aurora, Ill.

Has Hospital Equipment.

The Ambassador Health Club, a unique innovation, is equipped with the physical therapy and mechanical appliances furnished by the Health Equipment Co., of which Charles Graves is the Washington representative. Hospital cots and lounging chairs were furnished by the Gibson Co., of this city.

The contract for furnishing the Ambassador Hotel was let to the Walter M. Ballard Co., of this city, who have handled the interior decoration of many large Eastern hotels and steamships. In the treatment of the main lounge, men and women's lounges, corridors and guest chambers the modern note has been emphasized in draperies, carpets, lamps and furniture supplied by them. The Ballard Co. also furnished all room service linens.

Many of the guest chambers are furnished with Murphy beds purchased from the Murphy Door Bed Co., which permit the use of the rooms for either a bedroom or living

AN ADDRESS OF DISTINCTION

FRANKLIN SQUARE'S HISTORY INTRIGUES

In Former Times Supplied White House With Water From Its Spring.

SOLDIERS CAMPED THERE

Franklin Square, called Fountain Square and Public Lot, famous for its springs when Washington was young, represents probably the first investment made by the Government in Washington real estate, and it has a history not duplicated by any square in the District. Before the decision of Congress to remove the seat of Government to the Potomac, Franklin Square was a low and marshy piece of land on the farm called Port Royal, owned by Gen. John Davidson, of Annapolis.

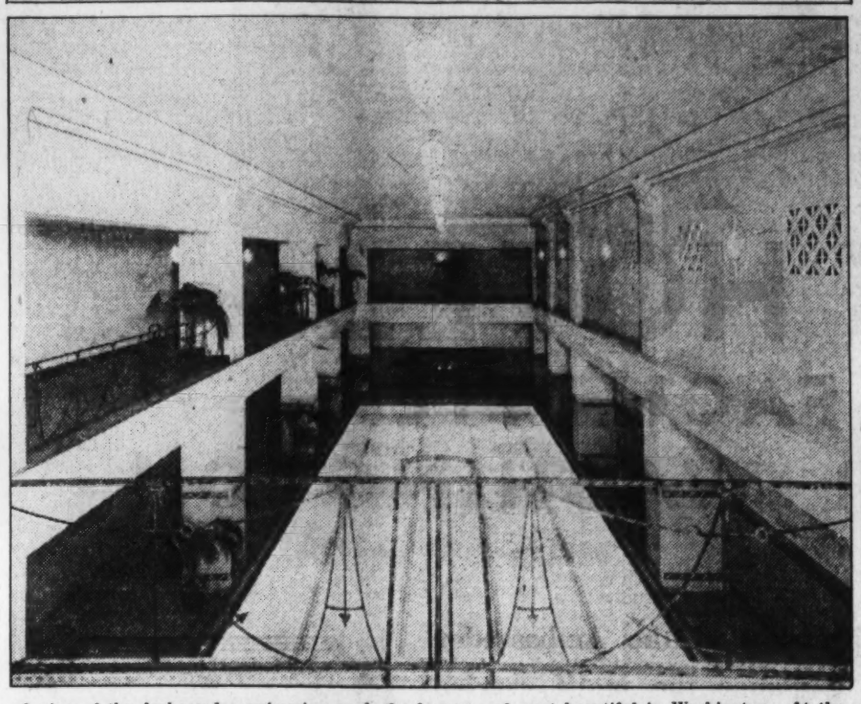
In 1796 this part of Davidson's land was subdivided into 30 lots, which in the division of the lots between the original landowners and the Federal Government, fell to the share of the United States. In 1801 these lots were acquired by Benjamin Stoddert. The springs began to attract the notice of settlers in the Federal City and in 1816 an appropriation was made by the corporation of Washington for the purchase of a spring and the necessary adjacent land. One of these springs was chosen, and from it was run a pipe line of hollow logs down Thirteenth street to F and along F to Fifteenth. About 1820 this pipe line was extended to supply the White House, and some of the Government departments in the days of Monroe, with drinking water. In 1829 an appropriation was made by the Government for the purchase and fencing of the remainder of the square in the sum of $8,000. In about 1834 the log pipe line was discontinued. The springs continued active until some time in the eighties, when the digging of the foundation pits for some of the tall hotels to the west and northwest of the square seemed to cut off the underground watercourse.

A great deal of filling and grading was done in Franklin Square 1851-52 when it was brought up to street grade. The square was nearly covered with wooden barracks in 1861 for the accommodation of incoming troops, and among the first to be quartered there was the Twelfth New York State Militia under Col. Butterfield. It was in 1864 that the square really became a park. That was the year in which the laying out of walks and planting of trees was begun.

On the northeast corner of Fourteenth and K streets in the 50's was the Rugby School, the great brick academy founded by the Rev. George Morrison and conducted with remarkable success, the first private school in Washington. In those days the school was so far out that pupils were not allowed to go into the city without special permission.

In the 80's and 90's K street was the most exclusive residential section of Washington and the center of social life of the city. In those days all entertaining was at home and diplomats from foreign countries mingled with Government officials, statesmen and ranking Army and Navy officers, in the big, handsome houses set far back, fronted with deep lawns, hedges and trees, that lined the streets. Such prominent men as Senator Sherman, Senator Pomeroy, Henry May, Gen. Casey, Dr. Loring, Speaker Carlisle, Admiral Worden, Senator Gorman and H. A. Willard, the largest real estate owner at that time in Washington on part of whose property the Ambassador now stands, had their residences in this section.

SWIMMING POOL ILLUMINATED BY CONCEALED LIGHTS



A view of the Ambassador swimming pool, the largest and most beautiful in Washington. At the extreme end is the ultraviolet ray machine for purifying the water.

Ambassador Swimming Pool Most Beautiful in Capital

Modern Rarifying Equipment and Concealed Marine Lights Are a Few of the Many New Features in Design.

Among the many innovations that mark with distinction the Ambassador Hotel, is the swimming pool. Expressing the modern in its colorful decorative treatment, it brings to this form of healthful recreation a most exquisite background for the enjoyment of the sport. The motif carried out is marine. Colorful tinted walls with rope pattern molding, modernistic wall lamps mounted on lifebuoy plaques and ornamental iron rail with an anchor and cable design carry out a pleasing harmony in the unusual treatment.

The pool itself, of tile with colored border, is most modern in design—20 feet wide by 70 feet long—it has a graduated depth of 3 feet at the shallow end to 9 feet at the diving end, and is illuminated below the surface by concealed marine lights, which lend a soft glow to the water. The water, pumped into the pool at the rate of 175 gallons per minute, first passes through the equipment of the R. U. V. ultra-violet ray system, which is capable of purifying 12,000 gallons of water an hour. Powerful quartz mercury vapor arc lamps, generate ultra-violet rays, which make the water absolutely pure, without the use of chemicals or other purifying agents generally used for this purpose, which might cause irritation to the eyes, ears, nose or other mucous membranes of the bather. No chlorine is used.

Used in Hospitals.

Just the beneficial action of these light rays produce the desired effect. The R. U. V. system is used in the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., in all the United States veterans' hospital pools, the Mexico Military Academy at Mexico City, as well as in many private pools. The same process is employed in the sterilization of drinking water in many small towns, country estates, private residences, theaters, offices and public buildings. The water is heated to the proper temperature for the season by a large instantaneous heater, which has a capacity of 5,000 gallons per hour, and which will raise the temperature of the water from 40 degrees to 80 degrees. There are three racing lines, and the pool being of championship size permits the holding of official swimming events.

Proper ventilation is insured at all times by the efficent equipment. Fresh air is constantly being forced in while impure air is being removed.

A mezzanine balcony surrounds the pool on three sides on which is located the registry office, where bathing equipment is obtained and lockers are assigned. Instead of the ordinary locker key or metal tag, each bather is given a rubber bracelet, which contains no metal but has a molded number which indicates the location of the locker, thus doing away with the inconvenience of dangling tags.

On the mezzanine balcony there are also tables where refreshments are served. On this balcony visitors are admitted. Adjoining the pool are the immaculate dressing rooms for men and women with individual steel lockers and showers. The attendant in charge of the ladies' locker room will have special facilities for drying hair.

Exercise Is Valuable.

The gayety and charm of the Ambassador pool make an irresistible appeal to those who love to swim. The value of this form of exercise has always been recognized and highly recommended on account of the rhythmic coordination it produces and the large number of muscles it brings into play. In addition to this, one also attains a great deal of enjoyment from it. From the first plunge into the pool until the final decision that it is time to leave, there are a constant series of thrills.

Conveniently located in the metropolitan section of the city, and close to theaters and offices, the Ambassador furnishes the opportunity without loss of time to indulge in this healthful recreation the year round. Large numbers of business and professional men and women are constantly foregoing this form of exercise on account of the lack of adequate facilities. At the Ambassador, one may enjoy a swim at any time during the day, from 8 a. m. to 10 p. m. The seashore atmosphere finds a delightful counterpart here. With smart swimming parties in the atmosphere of a club, in Washington's newest and most beautiful swimming pool, there is always something doing. Aquatic games, races and swimming parties create an air of gayety and a dull moment is the exception.

Guests at the Ambassador enjoy the free use of the pool as well as the handball court. An early morning plunge before work, or a swim during the day, or in the evening, is refreshing and invigorating, and helps to keep one in top form.

The Ambassador swimming pool is open to the public. Mixed bathing is permitted at all times with lifeguards in constant attendance. For those who do not know how to swim or who wish to improve their form, competent instructors are available for lessons. Here, also, one may make arrangements for private persons and swimming parties.

WATER FETE OPENS AMBASSADOR POOL

Commodore Longfellow Will Present King Neptune at Carnival.

NOVEL ACTS ARRANGED

Arrangements have been made by Harry M. Adams, director of the Ambassador Health Club, to present, through the courtesy of Commodore W. E. Longfellow, of the Red Cross Life-Saving Service, a water carnival on Sunday to feature the opening of the Ambassador pool.

Commodore Longfellow has invited King Neptune to hold court, and for his entertainment, as well as that of the guests, a number of the best-known swimmers in Washington and vicinity will take part in this program.

During the afternoon there will be an exhibition of diving, swimming, water stunts and games, as well as a demonstration of life-saving methods. Visitors will also have the opportunity to see the marine lights of the pool playing on the water, an unusual feature in swimming pool construction, and may inspect the ultra-violet ray machine which purifies the water without adding any chemicals which are injurious to the skin, eyes and mucus membranes.

Commodore Longfellow, in speaking of the advantages of swimming, remarked: "A swimming pool is something more than just that; it is a laboratory for the development of water safety methods. It is a place where a varied program of health-giving exercises can be properly applied to tired business men and women.

"Swimming is no longer an exclusive summer sport. Its benefits are widely recommended, and when opportunity affords, large numbers of people indulge in it the year around. In the old days one would just be getting a good start when cold weather would interfere, but it is now possible to continue swimming during the winter months in pools under the supervision of experts and under the most sanitary conditions."

Commodore Longfellow is responsible for King Neptune's presence at the opening of hundreds of swimming pools and has written many water pageant programs for pool openings all over the country. He has just returned from England, where he produced the water play "How Swimming Grew Up."

Visitors who drop in to see the events at the Ambassador pool today are assured an excellent entertainment. A number of water clowns and comedy characters will add a harmonious note for the delight of young folks as well as adults.

Sheet Metal-

A Necessity in Every Building!

In resistance to the elements nothing can take the place of sheet metal. It is durable, most economical and adaptable to design, and lends new beauty to all exterior work. Because of demonstrated advantages sheet metal work is being specified by leading architects and builders for use in many places where wood or other materials were formerly employed. This trend is especially noticeable in modern show windows where the use of sheet metal permits greater visibility and more attractive design.

AMBASSADOR HOTEL

Employs Sheet Metal in Ventilating System, Show Windows, Skylights and Metal Roofing

The Cafritz organization is deserving of the many congratulations they are receiving on the completion of this magnificent new building, and we believe that Washington itself is to be congratulated that such a splendid hostelry is added to the city's conveniences. The specifications for this building directed that finest quality and workmanship be employed in every detail, and because of these exacting standards we take pride in the fact that we were selected as the sheet metal contractors.

MANAGER OF HOTEL EXPERIENCED MAN

Capt. Jolley Is College Graduate and Has Directed Big Hostelries and Clubs.

CHEF IS FROM EUROPE

Capt. B. F. Jolley, general manager of the new Ambassador Hotel, is well fitted for this important position by his years of experience in executive service in the best hotels of the United States

Born in Chicago, he was educated in the schools of that city, being graduated from the University of Chicago, from which institution he holds a degree in electrical engineering. At the death of his father, Capt. Jolly entered the hotel business, and, recognizing its great possibilities, chose to remain in the profession which has brought him so many opportunities.

In 1916, leaving his position as assistant manager of the Knickerbocker Hotel in New York City, he was commissioned and assigned to the Pershing punitive expedition into Mexico. On this country's entrance into the World War, he was detailed to this city and later to the plant of E. I. du Pont de Nemours as a construction quartermaster, where he had occasion to employ his early training as an electrical engineer.

At the close of the war, he became general manager of the new Army and Navy Club of America, membership of which is composed of officers only.

Began Signature Book.

While there he had the distinction of being host to Gen. Diaz, Italian World War commander; Gens. Jaques and Gouraud and Marshal Foch, of the French army; King Albert of Belgium, and the Prince Imperial, now Emperor of Japan. At the opening of the club, he began a signature book, obtaining the autographs of the above mentioned, and hundreds of other famous guests. Upon leaving the club to assume his management of the Webster Hall, an 800-room hotel in Detroit, he presented the book and signatory pen to the institution.

Prior to coming to Washington Capt. Jolley was managing director of the Webster Hall Hotel of Pittsburgh, Pa., a 700-room establishment. Discussing his latest charge, the management of the Ambassador Hotel, the magnificent new enterprise sponsored by the Cafritz organization, Capt. Jolley said, "I came here from Pittsburgh because I saw the advantages of Washington. The hotel is modernistic in plan which greatly appeals to me, and I have carried this modern idea into the selection of a group of executives for this establishment, whose methods are as modern as the hotel itself."

How well he has succeeded in this idea is shown by his administrative roster. His assistant manager, J. M. Bendelari, held this same position with Capt. Jolley at the new Army and Navy Club of New York City. He also has been assistant manager at Kew Gardens, Long Island, and manager of the Montana Mines at Ruby, Ariz. He is a grandson of Hamilton Bendelari, who was Italian Ambassador to the Canadian government at Toronto.

The chef selected by Capt. Jolley is Noel Delabre, with a wide experience as chef de cuisine in noted European hotels. His American experience includes the famous Ritz-Carl-ton at Atlantic City, which he left two years ago to enter Capt. Jolley's organization.

Has Been Major-Domo.

The catering manager, V. D. Bruni, joins the management after four years' service as major-domo at the Cuban Legation, where he served many people prominent in the social and official life of this country, as well as in Europe and Latin America. Among these are Presidents Taft and Coolidge, President Machado of Cuba, Queen Marie, then crown princess of Roumania. Mr. Bruni's service at the legation was preceded by extensive European experience, including appointments at the Hotel Edward VII in Paris, and in the household of Prince Demidof, cousin of Czar Nicholas II.

J. A. LeGault, comptroller of the hotel, is installing the system of Horwath & Horwath, certified public hotel accountants of New York City. He has held similar positions with the Floridian Hotel at Miami Beach, the Lincoln Hotel of New York, Fenway Hall of Cleveland and many others.

Capt. Jolley's long experience in executive hotel positions has enabled him to make the best selection possible in his choice of important subordinates.

Hotel Uniforms Furnished Here

Ambassador Attaches Are Supplied by Livingston & Son.

Samuel Livingston & Son, clothiers, furnished the uniforms for all uniformed attendants of the Ambassador Hotel.

Samuel Livingston started in business in 1886, and as the business grew he took his son Benjamin into the firm. Today the establishment has the reputation of being one of the noted haberdasheries of the city.

Livingston & Son specialize in outfitting a uniform department and has made uniforms now worn in governmental departments and private institutions. The firm prepared uniforms for the American Railway Express, the Washington High School Cadets and other local units. Departments for both men and boys are maintained.

MANHATTAN CHEF TO DIRECT CUISINE

Delabre Has Had Training in European and American Hotels.

FINE DISHES PROMISED

Born in St. Etienne, France, and educated in the public and high schools of that city, M. Delabre's first hotel experience was with the Hotel Terminus of Lyons, France, after which he worked at the Hotel Belerive, Vichy, Hotel Victoria, Cannes and Hotel Pavilion, Nice, and other European hotels. In 1908 he came to America, and his experience in this country includes the famous Ritz-Carlton at Atlantic City and the Breakers of that city. He opened the Cavalier Hotel at Virginia Beach, Va., for the American Hotels Corporation, and later was associated with the Monticello Hotel of Norfolk, Va.

When interviewed regarding the Ambassador Food Service, M. Delabre, who has charge of the service, quoted the saying of the French gastronome, Brillat-Savarin, "L'animal se repait; l'homme mange; l'homme d'esprit sait manger," which translated into English means, "Animals feed; men eat; learned men know how, and where to eat." He follows these remarks with a few terse comments: "In these days of vitamins, food propaganda, editorials and books on diet, and general newspaper and magazine advertisements on the benefits of this and that, the average person is bewildered when it comes to making a decision on what to eat when dining in public.

Tells Where to Eat.

"If I had to get my meals in a restaurant, I would patronize only places that employ a highly trained chef, for such a man is a dietician, a chemist and a gastronome, besides being an expert on devising menus and combinations of dishes which will please the patrons and contain the proper amount of all the minerals, vitamines, proteins, fats and carbohydrates required by the human body to keep it in good health."

The Ambassador Hotel Food Service assures patrons of an excellent cuisine.

The beauty of the main dining room with its modern motif and rich appointments affords a most pleasing place to eat and also to entertain guests.

A number of club breakfasts offers a wide variety of dishes carefully planned to give the proper start for the day's activities. There is also a complete and varied a la carte menu for breakfast.

Special table d'hote luches will be served with many new and appetizing dishes appealing to the business man and woman, as well as to smart groups who wish to entertain socially at luncheon before the matinee or shopping tour.

Special al la Carte Supper.

At dinner one may have the choice of table d'hote or a la carte menus, offering a most attractive selection of delicious dishes for a well balanced meal. For those who enjoy an evening meal after the theater or evening's entertainment, a special a la carte supper will be served.

The Ambassador Hotel has made a careful selection of its personnel, choosing only those of ability and experience for the various positions.

In the selecting of foodstuffs, M. Delabre is most careful to see that only the finest meats and vegetables and the freshest dairy products are chosen. All bread, rolls and pasteries are made in the hotel bakery, and ices, ice

The building was furnished throughout with screens made by the shops of Woodward & Lothrop.

McInroy built the cabinet work for the shop, as well as the telephone booths and cigar stand equipment for the hotel.

The valet department operated by the hotel will have the newest valet shop equipment, including the two pneumatic compressors, furnished by the Prosperity Co.

The Ambassador Hotel is the first hostelry in Washington to feature in every guest room, as well as the public spaces, a radio loud speaker built into a specially designed writing desk, with a control switch permitting the reception of either of two radio programs rebroadcast from a central receiving station on the roof of the hotel. HOTEL WILL CATER TO TRAVEL GUESTS

Permanent Residence Also Is Provided For in the Ambassador.

HAS LOUNGE FOR WOMEN

The Ambassador Hotel makes a distinct appeal to the traveling public, as well as guests who desire a permanent residence, offering the services and conveniences of a high-class modern hotel with the luxurious atmosphere of a club. Modern in design and beautifully appointed in the modern manner, it contains many features that satisfy the requirements of today.

Commercial travelers, Army, Navy and Marine officers, business and professional men will appreciate the convenience of this hostelry to the business and financial districts of the city, as well as its proximity to theaters and Government departments. Comfortable and attractive rooms may be had at extremely reasonable rates, and guests may enjoy the free use of the large swimming pool and regulation handball court.

At the end of a busy day the enjoyment of these athletic features, as well as the Ambassador Health Club, which offers a scientific course of treatments for keeping fit, provides relaxation and recreation. If one cares to read a paper or smoke a pipe, he may do so in the spacious main lobby or men's lounge, or if he seeks the seclusion of his own room, he can enjoy the best radio programs by simply turning a switch on the loud-speaker equipment installed in every guest chamber in the hotel, as well as in the public spaces.

If one wishes to dine, he may use either the cafeteria, where appetizing dishes are served at moderate prices, or the beautifully appointed main dining room, with a la carte and table d'hote menus, offering an excellent cuisine. Varied stores on the ground floor, as well as the valet department in the hotel, serve the convenience of the guests.

The women guests at the Ambassador may be assured of a luxurious and dignified environment with a homelike atmosphere, with many charming features for comfort. She will appreciate the proximity of the hotel to the shopping and theater sections, will enjoy the excellent cuisine which the Ambassador offers, and may avail herself of the swimming pool, use of the special lingerie laundry and the lovely ladies' lounge with adjoining powder room on the mezzanine floor.

power. It is a real sport as well. The handball court conveniently adjoins the rooms of the club and the swimming pool. Swimming induces grace and rhythmic coordination and when combined with handball offers an ideal combination for the complete toning up of the muscular system.

The methods employed at the Ambassador Health Club build up bodies to normal proportions and set vital organs functioning vigorously. There are a few who fancy that they need no special knowledge in order to become strong and vigorous—that if they merely exercise in some way or other, the results will come. This is not true. Proper methods alone will produce the desired results. The methods followed at the club do not develop an unnecessary amount of muscular strength, which would cause a strain on the heart and nervous system. Many men will find in the health treatments of the Ambassador Health Club a means of restoring energy and preserving the health with a minimum loss of time from their business.

For Cooling—Electric Refrigerators are in use at The Ambassador. The Ventilating System is thoroughly electrical, as well. In each guest room convenience outlets are found for the use of individual fans.

For Power—Laundry equipment is electrically operated and Electric Elevators whisk one from floor to floor of the Ambassador. Powerful pumps are electrically driven to supply the swimming pool with filtered water. The power of Electric Motors is the pulse of the Ambassador's refrigeration, water and ventilating systems.

For Lighting—The Swimming Pool strikes a new note in lighting usefulness with underwater Electric Lights to illuminate every portion of the pool for greater safety. Decorative lighting is distinctive in The Ambassador assembly rooms and each guest room has provisions for abundant Electric Light.

EXPERT TO DIRECT HOTEL HEALTH CLUB

Harry M. Adams Has Been Successful in His Line in Three Cities.

BELIEVES IN PURE AIR

The Ambassador Health Club, an outstanding and original feature of the Ambassador Hotel, is to be conducted under the expert supervision of Harry M. Adams, who brings a broad experience covering 20 years of study and practice in the building of health. He has been associated with the Young's system of physical culture in Baltimore and Philadelphia, as sales manager and manager of the hydrotherapy department, and in this city, has been physical director of the Washington Athletic Club.

With such an extensive experience in health-building, Mr. Adams speaks with authority, when, in discussing the strain of business demands today, he said, "The greatest dissipation in the world today is the business man's desk chair. One of the most regrettable sights to me is that of a man sitting at his desk, trying to think clearly when he does not realize that his thinking power is controlled and supplied by his physical condition.

Mere Exercise Not Enough.

"Mere exercise will not produce genuine physical fitness any more than slipshod methods of doing business will yield great profits. If the average business man would give a tenth of the care to his body that he does to his auto, and give Nature just that proportion of an opportunity, he would find that at the end of the day, he would be free from that worn-out feeling that comes from the great exertion necessary to keep up with the terrific pace of modern business."

Recalling his past experience, which involves the treatment of thousands of run-down men, Mr. Adams declared that it had been proven that the use of a health club brought renewed health, greater vitality, more zest for living, and a keener mind for business.

Believes in Pure Air.

Mr. Adams is a firm believer in the powers of pure air and light. He asserted that the reason the average man feels better and can accomplish more in the fall than in the spring is due to the great amount of sunlight his body has been constantly absorbing and assimilating during the summer months.

A growing recognition of the fact that the business man of today must take some action to keep himself fit and a realization that the business life of the present undermines health and saps vitality is paving the way for a greater use of the methods employed by the Health Club, and Mr. Adams is optimistic, even confident, that his work here will be successful.

The location of the Ambassador Hotel, so convenient to the business district, will aid his plans for promoting the physical welfare of the business men of Washington who need take so little of their time to help him make them better.

Ambassador Augments Choice Building Group

A new generation of imposing buildings has sprung up in the place of the many beautiful residences that once lined K street. Many of the old landmarks still remain, reminiscent of the days when the social center of Washington was in the vicinity of Vermont avenue. Increasing real estate caused by the growth of the city and the rapid spreading of the business and financial districts have brought about this change. Among the monumental buildings erected recently are the Southern Railway Offices at Fifteenth and K streets, the Tower Building at Fourteenth and K streets and the Ambassador Hotel, the smart new 12-story, fireproof hostelry, built by the Cafritz Organization at Fourteenth and K streets opposite Franklin Park.

CAFRITZ REMOVES OFFICES TO HOTEL

Two Floors Will Be Used for Organization of Real Estate Firm.

BOY DREAMS REALIZED

The completion of the Ambassador Hotel, built by the Cafritz organization and the removal of the company's offices to that building, marks another stage in the growth of the business and an outstanding contribution to the development of greater Washington. The Ambassador Hotel brings to the city a new idea of modern comfort and convenience, and the many unusual features it offers are the result of much study and research and comparison with the finest hotels in the Eastern United States.

The Cafritz organization will occupy offices in the building. On the first floor will be located the rent department, business properties department, cashier and telephone switchboard. On the second floor are the private executive offices, the accounting offices, house sales department, settlement manager, loan manager and construction department.

The phenomenal rise of the Cafritz organization to a position of leadership in the real estate field within the last six years, is one of the outstanding business romances of the Nation's Capital, and testifies to the vision, courage and initiative of Morris Cafritz, the founder and president of the organization. Mr. Cafritz is constantly thinking of the future of Washington, not only today and tomorrow, but of a greater Washington of next year and the years to follow when the city then will bear the same relation to the city now, that the Washington of today bears to the Washington of four or five years ago. This vision and the courage to make the vision a reality is something that is fundamental with Mr. Cafritz.

Only a Beginning.

There is a little story about Mr. Cafritz which shows just how his thoughts run. One day in the course of conversation, the writer took occasion to remark on the splendid growth of the organization, the magnitude of its construction program and the character and quality of the buildings that it erected, expecting his listener to make some reply of like nature. He was disappointed. All that Mr. Cafritz said in the face of such praise was: "It is only the beginning." This is the spirit that is instilled into the Cafritz organization, and it is this spirit that makes outstanding accomplishment the expected rather than the unusual.

It was only six years ago that a young man, without influence or backing, set out in a very modest way to realize an ambition of his youth. As a boy selling newspapers on the streets of Washington, he was always attracted by building construction, and would spend his spare time watching the erection of homes, apartments and commercial buildings. Mr. Cafritz told his story in all its colorful details to a gathering of his employes at a recent dinner of the organization, and one could easily see the earnestness and ambition of the boy still alive in the man.

Back of all successful accomplishment, no matter what the field, are the plans, policies and a strong and well organized personnel working in cooperation with an enlightened and far seeing management, which makes for that success. Such is the case with the Cafritz organization.

The record of the Cafritz organization since its beginning is one of unusual brilliance, and has its inspiration for those who need look no further than their own city for opportunities.

Sees Greater Opportunities.

In a recent talk with Mr. Cafritz, the conversation drifted to the subject of success. The writer, anxious to find out all that he could, asked Mr. Cafritz about the opportunities for a young man today. Mr. Cafritz replied that the opportunities of today are much greater than ever before. On every side and in every walk of life one has a splendid opportunity to earn as well as learn. Business men of today are more progressive, more willing to make changes and improvements for the benefit of the business, and are constantly alert to new ideas, and always ready to take on the man who can accomplish their plans and in turn carry the business to further success.

In the early stages of its growth, the Cafritz organization realized its success depended on a definite plan and policy in its activities, and the strict adherence to this fundamental plan, with the improvements and changes brought about by changing conditions, has given it a goal on which time has set the seal of approval. One of the first things decided upon was to give the purchaser the benefit of the economies resulting from its operations. This affected the price of the house and went back still further to the cost of production. The larger the quantities of material the lower the price. This applied to land as well as construction materials.

The Cafritz organization has built thousands of homes in new subdivisions, many outstanding apartment structures, of which the Park Central at Nineteenth and K streets northwest, is the most recent project, and thousands of new homes in Petworth and new subdivisions, and a number of palatial residences and commercial and industrial buildings.

HARMONY OF COLOR IN THE AMBASSADOR

the silk draperies are carried out in shades to tone in with the walls and carpets. The walls in all public rooms and stairways are in oil-textured effect in new and original designs, ultramodernistic, yet beautiful without being bizarre, and retaining that restful effect so necessary in a modern hotel. The ceilings are all stippled in neutral tints to blend with the walls.

Ladies' Lounge and Powder Room.

The walls in the ladies' lounge are textured in a scroll design in three colors harmonizing with the modern adaptation of an old Egyptian cornice, high-lighted in two shades of peach. The woodwork is of natural gray glazed in peach, and the furniture of selected ebony, burrel oak and matched grain walnut, upholstered in plush and silk damasks in shades of peach and brown which tone in with the draperies of the same colors. The powder room adjoining the ladies' lounge is furnished with artistic pieces of furniture of similar exquisite design used in the ladies' lounge, with carpet of leopard skin effect. The walls in the powder room are "Dernier Cri" in modern design with silver ceiling and silver walls broken by square and angular designs of burnt orange, yellow and black. The woodwork is of neutral gray glazed in sun tan.

Men's Lounge.

In contrast to the ladies' lounge, this room is done in a more rugged style, using deeper tones of browns taupes and gold shades that are blended and used in carpet, furniture and wall treatment. In styling this room, as well as the others, exhaustive study was made from information expounded from the Art Moderne, particularly by Paul Rodier, who has been so capable in bringing this new art into popular acceptance. In this room will be found writing desks, smokers and comfortable lounging chairs and reading lamps which all lend comfort and convenience to the men guests.

Guest Chambers.

In the guest chambers, careful attention was given in the selection of furniture to insure the patrons of the greatest comfort. Selected walnut is used throughout with veneer grained in vertical fashion. Radio loud speakers are ingeniously combined with the writing desks where the guests may make a choice of two programs. The carpets are in the modern style in soft shades of mulberry and brown, and the windows have sheer net curtains with overdraperies of mohair with contrasting valances. Here the guests will find keen delight in the attractive ensemble of color and design with the absence of any disturbing note. All of the guest chambers and corridors are papered in strictly modernistic design, the first time ever used in a Washington hotel, these designs being created in Europe especially for the Ambassador. All of the trim in the guest rooms and corridors is of matched chestnut finished with semigloss of a beautiful velvet tone. The woodwork is milled in a unique modernistic style in keeping with the entire decorative scheme. The baths and public toilets are finished in white enamel to match with the tiling of black and white.

The walls surrounding the swimming pool room are also of rough textured surface in colored sands with an original wave effect in shades of subdued tans. The nautical effect is carried out in the cornices, which are designed in life saver style. The same nautical effect is carried out in the iron grilled railing around the balcony. The Health Club rooms, lockers and showers as well as the handball court are all rough texture and finished in quiet tones.

VIEW IN AMBASSADOR HOTEL CAFETERIA

Every Ambassador Room Has Radio Loud Speaker

The Ambassador Hotel will be the first in Washington offering to its guests a radio loud speaker in every room and is one of the few hotels in the country in which radio will be part of the customary service without extra charge. In keeping with the expression of the modern in every phase of design, construction, appointments and operation, this radio feature will be greatly appreciated by the guests who need do nothing else than turn the radio control switch on the writing desk, into which the loud speaker equipment has been built.

A choice of programs will be available from a splendid studio on top of the hotel, which will tune in on the best programs on the air through powerful receiving sets, and distribute them by wire throughout the hotel.

Microphones in the dining room, swimming pool and lounges facilitate broadcasting within the hotel of any programs which may be desired. On nights when static makes reception poor or storms interfere, the Ambassador radio station is equipped to broadcast recorded programs.

A feature of great importance is the control of the volume of sound in every room so that programs will not be heard in adjoining rooms. Herstofore head sets have been the popular method in hotels where radio programs are furnished in every room. In the Ambassador loud speakers only will be used.

The Ambassador Hotel entered into contracts with the Natural Sound Amplifying System, Incorporated, to install the latest improved methods of distributing sound to its various rooms. This company is using the same methods at the Ambassador Hotel as it employed in the installation of the Natural Sound Amplifying System in the City of New York, where it distributes the music of the bands playing at Central Park, Manhattan and Prospect Park, Brooklyn, to 25 other parks throughout the five boroughs of New York, over more than 600 miles of the fire department telegraph cables.

The installation of this radio amplifying equipment reflects the increasing desire for home entertainment, and the Ambassador Hotel in offering this feature makes it possible for guests, in the home-like surroundings and luxurious comfort of their own rooms, to enjoy the best programs available.

AMBASSADOR HOTEL RUN BY ELECTRICITY

New Building Boasts All the Latest Conveniences in Rooms.

POOL LIGHTING UNIQUE

Electrical equipment in the Ambassador Hotel, Fourteenth and K streets northwest, is the last word in modern convenience. An unusual lighting arrangement has been effected in the swimming pool. Here the lighting fixtures are below the water level, the water reflecting the light sufficiently to illuminate the high-ceilinged room in which the pool is located. Swimming safety is aided by this lighting, which makes it impossible for a bather to sink without being seen.

In the Ambassador kitchens an electric baking oven is a new feature in hotel equipment. It is of unusually large capacity and is heavily insulated to retain heat for long periods. There are also electric griddles and electric waffle irons. Electric mixing machines, vegetable peeler and dish-washers are also installed in the kitchen. Refrigeration equipment for the keeping of ice cream is also electrical.

Installation of electrical equipment at the Ambassador was handled by "Lectric Joe" from plans submitted by the commercial engineering department of the Potomac Electric Power Co.

WASHINGTON: SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1929.

Uncle Sam's Three Musical Aces

Leaders of the Three Service Bands of the United States and the Musicians Under Them Give This Country a Human Advertisement Which Is Worth More to the Nation Than Any Amount of Printed Propaganda.

By DON B. REED.

"HERE comes the band!" How many times Washingtonians have heard that cry along historic Pennsylvania avenue and have looked up to see the Army Band or the Marine Band or the Navy Band go marching by. What a thrill goes up and down your spine whe. you see these men in their brilliant uniforms playing Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever," or "Anchors Aweigh," or "The Halls of Montezuma."

They are your representatives you say. The pride of the Capital. But don't forget that these three bands are not entirely yours. They are the pride of the rest of the country as well. For after all, they represent the entire Nation through the three branches of the service.

This is the time of year when the three great bands pack up their instruments, gather up the great trunkloads of music, press their uniforms and depart on their annual tours which take them to the principal cities of the country for concerts, which are a treat to the thuosands who have only one opportunity each season to hear the noted organizations.

Into the East and North; into the Middle West and down into the Southern States go "Uncle Sam's Three Musical Aces," Capt. William J. Stannard, leader of the Army Band; Capt. Taylor Branson, leader of the Marine Band, and Lieut. Charles Benter, leader of the Navy Band. They are the Government's musical emissaries, sent out to show the people of the Nation that, as in every other respect, the United States leads the way in music.

Nearly 300 men are connected with the three great service bands. Each is a walking, playing advertisement for this great Government of ours, which does big things in a big way. Each appearance of one of the bands at some city, town or hamlet away from the Capital is the signal for a revival of the patriotic spirit which has always risen to such great heights when danger has threatened the Stars and Stripes from without or within.

Whether it be Army, Navy or Marine, the concerts are well received everywhere and municipal organizations, civic clubs, high school musical societies and individuals make strenuous efforts each season to bring one of the service bands to their city that the people may have the best in the land and yet at reasonable cost.

Here in Washington there is a slight inclination to overlook the real value of these musicians. The chief reason is that the Capital sees and hears so much of them that they are, in a measure, "taken for granted." All summer long these bands have played in the parks, at the Capitol, in the hospitals and for many events of public and semipublic nature. They are to be found in the line of march of almost every parade, and Washington has more than her share of parades. Residents simply understand that one, two or three of the service bands will appear and, while they are always greeted with applause along the line of march, few stop to consider the talent contained within any one of the three groups.

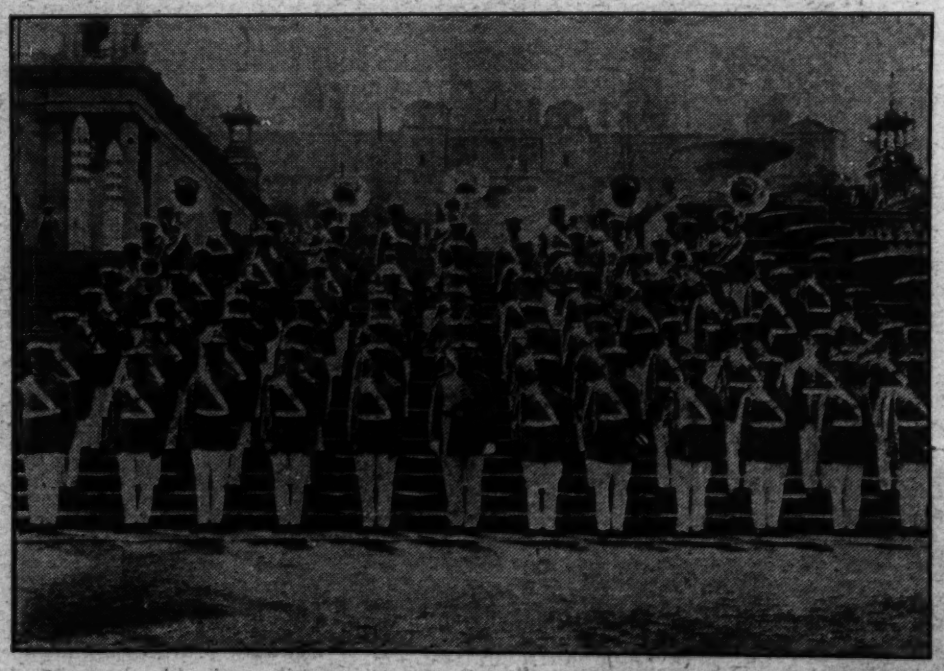
Despite any rumors to the contrary, there is no feeling among the "The Musical Aces" as to which should be accorded precedence when affairs of state and social importance require the appearance of all three. The three leaders, Branson, Stannard and Benter get together, decide upon their course and nothing but the friendliest of feeling exists. So cordial are the relations between the men who direct the three bands, that when one desires a certain piece of music for a concert which is not in his library, he simply calls one of the other leaders and the request has no sooner been made than the music is on its way. With such cooperation it is no wonder that the three bands have risen to the point where they may compete with any similar organization and come out with colors flying and the praise of critics ringing in their ears.

This year the Marine Band will start its tour in the Great Lakes region, travel through Michigan and gradually work southward until it reaches Texas. Three weeks will be spent in this Lone Star State and Texans are looking forward with much pleasure to the arrival of Capt. Branson and his men.

The Navy Band is going North and East with ten days devoted to concerts in and around New York while New England cities will also hear Lieut. Benter's men in concerts all along the line. The Navy musicians will be missing from the Capital for eight weeks and expect to have another triumphal tour.

Capt. Stannard will combine East and Middle West on the itinerary of his tour. Some cities in western New York will be visited and the band will also make appearances in many of the larger cities through Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. That the Army Band is welcome any place goes without saying.

Each of the three bands lays claim to a certain distinction which can not be claimed by either of the others. For instance, the Army Band proudly points to its selection to play at the Ibero-American Exposition at Seville, Spain, where the American musicians were acclaimed because of their splendid concerts. The Marine Band is the official musical organization at the White House and is proud of that honor. In fact the circular telling of the Marine Band's history mentions this fact on several occasions. And the Navy Band, formed by its present leader, lays claim to the title of the fastest growing musical organization in America and by growing is meant a steady growth in ability and in recognition from the general public before which the organization plays. This year the Navy Band also is playing more often over the radio than either of the other service bands.



The Army Band photographed on the steps of one of the exposition buildings at Seville, Spain.

In describing the history of the three bands, let us start with the youngest of the trio—the Army Band. Although it was not officially organized until 1922, its birth may be traced back to the days of the World War, when Gen. Pershing, seeing the need of music to restore the morale of the hard-fighting Yanks in France, organized the A. E. F. Band, known as "Pershing's Own." While this band disintegrated upon the signing of the armistice, one of Pershing's first acts after becoming chief of staff was to send out a call over the entire country for the pick of the Army's musicians to form an Army Band.

Organization was completed at Fort Hunt, Va., in the spring of 1922, and in September of that year the band was ordered to Washington. In this city, after an exhaustive competition, Capt. William J. Stannard was selected to lead the Army's new official musical organization. He is still at its head.

Under Capt. Stannard's able leadership the Army Band has accomplished much. It has been the official band for numerous diplomatic and state functions in the Capital. It led the Lindbergh home-coming celebration parade, the Coolidge and Hoover inauguration parades, the Defense Day parade and the funeral procession for the late President Warren G. Harding. The Army Band is the official band for the introduction of Latin-American music in this country through the Pan-American Union.

Much has been said of the Army Band's trip to Seville to play at the Ibero-American Exposition. This, perhaps, is the high spot for the band's short career, but it is one which will be remembered long by both countries involved. Spain greeted the Army musicians cordially, and at the close of their stay nothing but praise for the soldiers could be heard. Capt. Stannard and his men created a favorable impression everywhere, not only with their music, but with their deportment, and to say that they were one of the "hits" of the exposition is putting it mildly, indeed.

The leader of the Army Band was born in Connecticut and in 1901 enlisted with the Tenth Band of the Coast Artillery Corps at Boston, studying clarinet in his spare time with C. L. Staats, of that city. At the age of 19 he became solo clarinetist of this band, then considered one of the Army's best. Transferred from one Army band to another, Capt. Stannard kept up his studies in music, seeking instruction from the famous masters of his instrument including Norrito of Sousa's Band and Leroy of the Garde Republique of France.

A four-year scholarship in the Institute of Musical Art directed by Dr. Frank Damrosch was won by Stannard in 1911 and he graduated as the best pupil of his class. From that time, until he was selected to lead the new Army band, Capt. Stannard conducted outstanding Army bands in all sections of the country. One of his most recent honors was conferred by the government of Peru which decorated him with the Order of the Sun for "distinguished services" in connection with the introduction of Latin-American music in the United States.

Capt. Stannard, while modest regarding his personal abilities, is proud of the record of his band, especially on the trip to Spain. He tells of playing before 45,000 in Madrid, of being allowed to conduct the King's Band in Seville, of a concert given in the opera house at Barcelona, and of the favorable impression made by his men in thrice daily concerts aboard the Leviathan on trips both ways across the Atlantic.

While the Navy Band was formed in 1919 it was not until 1925 that Congress officially gave it recognition and made it a permanent institution in this great Capital City of the Nation. The history of the band is in reality a history of the dynamic young leader, Lieut. Charles Benter, for he organized it and is with it today, striving always to rise higher in the musical world. Lieut. Benter enlisted in the United States Navy as an apprentice boy and soon made his presence felt through perseverance and industry. He was soon promoted to a post on the battleship Rhode Island. At the age of 20 Mr. Benter was given the rank of bandmaster, the youngest man ever to hold this position in the Navy.

Having chosen his career, Lieut. Benter stuck to his knitting closely, and during the World War was in charge of a band on the U. S. S. Connecticut, flagship of Admiral Dunn and later Admirals Rodman and Glennon. His work in developing the band and orchestra on this ship brought him to the attention of the highest officers of the fleet. Lieut. Benter continued his studies of music and in the concerts of bands he conducted there was always to be found colorful arrangements and careful revision of the classics to suit the needs of his particular organization.

It was not surprising, then, after the armistice, that the Navy Department ordered Lieut. Benter to Washington to organize the official Navy Band. When the young bandmaster arrived at the Capital he found that the after-effects of the war, the desire to return to civil life, had left him only eighteen musicians as a nucleus for his band. Undauted, he started work, and through untiring effort to improve the salaries and living conditions of musicians in the Navy, he soon recruited his band to full strength. Its record since that time is proof enough of the success of Benter's methods.

The bandmaster was not satisfied with the appearance of his unit, so in 1924 the sea-going uniform of the traditional sailor was discarded for the regulation chief petty officer's uniform for each man in the band. When the Navy Band made its first appearance in these new uniforms on Pennsylvania avenue all Washington joined in the cheers over the improvement. As a further surprise the band appeared in the parade for President Coolidge's inaugural in special full dress uniforms with gold braid trimmings.

Lieut. Bender's picture gallery is full of photographs signed by Presidents and other notables of the past few years, attesting his popularity both as a musician and as a man. The Navy Band has played selections for recording companies and is in demand at almost every social and state function in the Capital. Lieut. Benter has been awarded an honorary degree as Doctor of Music by Columbus University of Washington and is also a member of the American Bandmasters Association.

Marine Band history goes back considerably farther than the lives of the other two service groups. It was in the year 1798 that Congress authorized the first Marine Band, which consisted of a drum major, a fife major and 32 "drums and fifes." The real origin of the bands dates back to revolutionary days when Benjamin Franklin saw on the drum of the Marines a motto, "Don't Tread on Me," with the picture of a rattlesnake. The motto has survived for the Marines until the present time.

Only fifes and drums were used during the Revolutionary War and the men in the Marines playing these instruments were known as "Musics." Drum Major William Farr formed the first military band of Marines at Philadelphia shortly before 1801, and concerts in that city charmed the residents of what was then the Capital of the United States. When the Capital was moved to Washington, the Marines came along, pitching their tents on a hill overlooking "the beautiful Potomac" on the present site of the Naval Hospital.

Washington then was "a City of Magnificent Distances" and the Marines did much to relieve the monotony of existence in the Capital. Concerts on the Hill became famous, because all Washington society gathered there to hear this group of musicians. The Marine Band was the only military band in the Capital until after 1830.

The official debut of the Marines at the White House was made during the term of President Adams, on New Year's Day, the first of an almost unbroken series of New Year's concerts at the headquarters of Presidents. Since Jefferson's day, the Marine Band has played at every inaugural which called for music.

Seventeen leaders have directed the Marine Band in its long career in the Capital. They are William Farr, Charles S. Ashworth, Venerando Pulizzi (three terms), John Powley, John B. Cuvillier (two terms), Francis Schenig, Raphael R. Triay (two terms), Antonio Pons (two terms), Joseph Luccheasi, Francis Scala, Henry Pries, Louis Schneider, John Philip Sousa, Fransico Fanciulli, William H. Santelmann and the present leader, Capt. Taylor Branson.

The first review of a band by a President took place on July 4, 1801, when President Jefferson reviewed the Marine Band on the White House Grounds. Throughout the years the Marine Band was called upon for all sorts of diplomatic and state functions, one particular instance being the entertainment of the Prince of Wales (Edward VII) when President Buchanan was in office. The band also played at a number of important weddings at the White House.

Congressional authorization of the Marine Band did not come until July 25, 1861, under President Lincoln, and then later, in 1899, the salaries of the band were increased and provision made for its leader and other officers. Two further bills in 1918 and 1925 have improved conditions for the Marine Band.

Capt. Taylor Branson, present leader of the Marine Band, is a native of Washington, born on July 31, 1881. He is the son of James Taylor and Serena Moore Branson. Educated in the public schools in this city, he studied violin under Capt. William H. Santelmann, his predecessor at the head of the Marine Band, now retired. Capt. Branson also studied clarinet under Andres Coda, and composition under Arthur Tregina. He married Marie Quill, of Washington, June 1, 1909.

The Marine leader enlisted in the Marine Band in 1898 and became second leader in 1930. He was solo violinist in 1907 and has been leader of the Gridiron Club Orchestra since 1912. Capt. Branson is proud of the history of the organization he leads and is constantly working to better the programs of his musicians that they may add to the already illustrious record of the Marines.

While the three "musical aces" are addressed by every one as "captain" in the case of the Army and Marine bands and as "lieutenant" in the case of the Navy Band (lieutenant in the Navy being the same rank as captain in the Army) none of the three is in reality more than a band leader officially. However, the acts of Congress authorizing the bands, give them the pay of the honorary titles they receive, which many believe should belong to them officially.

All three of the service bands have one thing in common. They are subject to call at a moment's notice to appear for parades, concerts and other functions. Each of the leaders must know without any instructions from his superior, what music will be appropriate for the occasion; how many bugle flares are proper to greet various diplomats and notables who visit the Capital and what sort of a program must be presented to please every one connected with the event.

Constant work is connected with the handling of the bands. Rehearsals take up much of the time. Arrangements of various numbers and of new music constantly received require thought and study. Practicing special orchestral features or drilling sections of the band for specialties are other things which keep the musicians and their leaders on the jump.

Yet through it all, these three "musical aces" never lose their heads. They receive orders and execute. More often than not when the affair is completed, they receive praise from their superiors and from foreign guests because of the appearance of the bands and the music played.

Each band is striving mightily to outdo the other two, but with all this rivalry there is a friendly undertone because the men in each organization want all three to look their best and play their best as representatives of the United States as well as of the Navy, the Army and the Marines.

The Dog That Comforted Edgar Allan Poe in His First Great Tragedy.

By Preston Wright.

WHEN Edgar Allan Poe returned to Richmond in June, 1820, from his five-year sojourn in England, whither he had been taken by his foster father, John Allan, and his wife, Frances, his first thought was of his brown spaniel, Comrade, whom he had left behind when he went abroad.

Would the dog remember him? It was a question that kept repeating itself in his boy's mind as he neared the comfortable home which Mr. Allan's success in business had enabled him to own.

Well, it is tragic, but it must be recorded that when Comrade, now grown old, ran stiffly to greet the returning family, he did not recall his young master.

Five years, bridging the gap between 6 and 11, had brought a big change in Edgar Poe. It is not strange that the spaniel had forgotten him.

But gradually the affectionate animal's memory stirred itself. By the next day the old intimacy had revived, and so Comrade came to play the role of faithful friend in an episode that had an important bearing on Edgar Allan Poe's career.

Soon after his return, Edgar went to the quiet cemetery where his mother lay buried—his real mother, whom loving Frances Allan, despite all her kindly efforts, could not replace. Evening was falling. Lapsing into sadness, the boy lingered longer than he thought. Night had long been on when he reached home.

John Allan awaited him with a heart full of suspicion. What tricks had the boy been up to? He was avid with questions, and when Edgar, suddenly resolving to keep secret his tryst at his mother's grave, he grew furiously angry.

He whipped the boy, but in his blind rage he hurt him far more with his lashing tongue.

"A boy dependent upon the bounty of strangers can not afford to practice bad habits," he said.

"Dependent upon strangers" The words fixed themselves indelibly in

The Tomato-As a Campaign Issue

Senator Copeland and Premier Mussolini Rise to the Defense of the Once-Despised "Fruit" With Startling Results; A History of the Tomato in America, Dating Back to the Year 1830.

By DAVID RANKIN BARBEE.

THE year 1830 was memorable in American history. That year the abolitionists began their drive against slavery; that year the first tomato was eaten in this country. It took courage to become an abolitionist, for the antislavery men were a despised sect down to the firing on Fort Sumter. It took greater courage to eat that tomato, for it was thought to be deadly poison, unfit for food. Today we do not think so contemptuously of Garrison and his followers as our ancestors did; neither do we shun the humble tomato with a shudder of horror. Rather we have placed it on a pedestal as a new god to worship, for the benefits it has conferred on humanity.

It is not given us to know the name of the hero who first "the fruit of tha' forbidden tree" did pluck and eat. But who'er he was, he was no mean benefactor. If the abolitionist freed the white man and the black man from the bondage of slavery, our hero made it possible for the tomato to free all men from the bondage of terrible disease and to point the hope of science to that day when all disease will be banished from earth. To which, then, shall we give the greater honor?

An illustrious man rose to first place in the Nation on the foundation reared by the abolitionists through years of persecution. He represented a civilization that came up through travail, a mighty upheaval of human nature which gathered to itself all the feeble torches of liberty and bound them together into one mighty beacon light, whose flame proclaimed liberty throughout the world.

The tomato has aroused no such passion as this. Its champions have not been murdered as Lovejoy was at Alton, Ill., nor mobbed as was Garrison on Boston Common. They are a different type of men. Their weapons are test tubes and microscopes; their press, scientific journals; their laboratories, the nursery in the home, the hospital and the lecture hall.

For long years scientists have regarded the tomato with awe and reverence. Little by little they have picked it to pieces, and step by step they have forced it to give up its secrets. If slavery had been subjected to such an examination; if it had passed through such a critical and patient laboratory testing; what misery, what woe, what waste of life and money and feeling the world might have been spared!

It was not to be expected that anything that has the stamp of science on it would escape the clutches of politics in this country. Evolution, the most purely speculative philosophy taught in our schools, could not! so how could the tomato? Like abolition and slavery, it has made an issue, and our politicians are always looking for an issue. Its most ardent champion is Senator Royal S. Copeland, of New York, a willing candidate for the Presidency. Nobody expects him to run for that high office with a ripe tomato in each hand, yet if forced to it he would cut no contemptible figure in that role. Very boldly he spoke to his peers when they were vexed and harassed over the tomato soliloquy: "To tax or not to tax." His quiet exclamation arrests attention. "I would hate to see anything happen to the tomato," said he. "It is our most important fruit."

There was no need for him to amplify that statement, for his associates knew he spoke as a statesman as well as a doctor and a humanitarian. If any controversy arose over the tomato, they realized that he would stand by humanity and with the scientists. He could point with pride, with all the bold and rugged enthusiasm of a Republican national platform, to the mighty deeds of his friend the tomato, and by placing his candidacy in the hands of its friends have a body of suffrage unequalled in the history of American politics. Let us see if this is not so.

It used to be that poor people were in the majority in this country. Lincoln made his appeal to them, and won immortality. The palm, however, has passed from the poor to the scientists. They outnumber all other groups, for everybody is a scientist nowadays—real, pseudo or intending-to-be. To this large body of opinion Senator Copeland can confidently appeal, with all the enthusiasm with which Lincoln laid his great problems on the hearts of the masses of his generation.

"Brother scientists," he could say, "this tomato led Casimir Funk to his greatest discovery, the vitamins. Its contribution to science is larger than that of all the fruits and vegetables that cumber the earth. It made possible the discovery of the North Pole and of the South Pole. It drove scurvy from the high seas. Without it Commander Byrd would not so confidently be spending two years in the frozen Antarctic."

This language all of them would understand. This tribute to one of their great men would thrill their emotions. They can conjure up in their imaginations what the scurvy has done to the sailor and the soldier. It has claimed 10,000 victims—on the seven seas to every one chalked up by the hurricane; and in war 100,000 have fallen from its ravages to every 1,000 who fell in front of an enemy's bullets. They have read the sad story of the many deaths from scurvy in camp in France in the A. E. F., the best equipped and the best provisioned army that ever bowed the knee to the great god Mars. "This little fruit has the power to prevent all that," says its champion. "Are you for or against it? Who is on the tomato's side?" There would be no Republicans and no Democrats among them on that issue.

Nor would the American mothers divide when Senator Copeland aroused them with his appeal. They rose as one woman in 1916 when Woodrow Wilson and his slogan, "He kept us out of the war," stirred their spirited enthusiasm. With this lamp to guide our feet, can we not hope to see them once more rise and cheer when the tomato's champion paints before their eyes a scene familiar to all of them—underfed, undernourished children, from babes in arms to adolescents, thin, wan, emanciated, aenemic, with bent legs, enlarged joints, heads overaized and faces pinched and small. What woman, whether mother or maid, has not seen many a case of rickets and wept over it? To them one look at the tomato, one word from Senator Copeland gently saying, "This fruit will cure all of that; it has cured all of that;" and tears would be dried, and faces would light up with an unwonted look of hope, as those women moved over to the side of the scientists and pledged themselves to the friend of the tomato.

As the campaign progressed Senator Copeland would have a kind word for the farmers. They always get that at election times. And if the truth were known, there is no class of American people so pampered by the Government and by the politicians as the farmers. It has gotten to be a very sore spot with them to point to the fact that Uncle Sam spends $100 to cure animal diseases to every $1 he spends to cure human diseases. If you would see how much more the Government thinks of hogs than it does of humans, look in at the laboratory where hog cholera is being studied and then at the hygienic laboratory where world-famous scientists come to grips with human cholera. Still, it is popular to regard the farmer as a much neglected individual, and so our tomato champion would not let slip this opportunity to hold his tomato up to their unadmiring gaze.

As he warmed to his task he would point to the wealth the growing of the tomato had brought to the farmers, and show them in what States it is a money crop. Then he would pass to the new language the farmers have learned to talk, and tell them how scientists had discovered that the vitamins found in the tomato were found also in certain grasses and other foods fed to livestock and to poultry. "These foods have increased the health of your animals," he would tell them, "so that they now give more milk and richer milk, and take on more flesh and better flesh. This puts money in your pockets, for you no longer have to feed haphazard. You are now feeding your poultry a balanced ration, which makes them more vigorous, and they lay more eggs for you. The tomato has brought about as much of a revolution in agriculture as it has in medicine and in living. Do you owe it nothing?"

It would not do to say that the conservative farmers would rush en masse over to the side where the women and the scientists are standing, or were standing a few paragraphs back. But those of average intelligence would shift their feet and make a motion like they had thought of doing so. Farmers, we are told, are the backbone of the Nation, just because they have a backbone and are slow moving. Don't ever make the mistake of thinking they can't hurry. When they get an idea in their heads they don't just run; they fly. Senator Borah and Senator Norris and the late Senators Dolliver and LaFollette proved that. So if the farmers catch stride with Senator Copeland's tomato, they will soon be loping along behind his royal banner.

And so we might go on with group after group, building up our case for everybody's friend, the tomato, but even it must have terminal points, and the bank is about the best we can think of. Nothing that grows makes such an appeal to the almighty dollar as this same lowly fruit. This Senator Copeland knows; this is his ace in the hole, for he, like the late Mr. Bryan, knows that no campaign can run on four wheels without money. To all industry and business, whether it be the manufacturer, the merchant, the railroad man, the shipowner or the banker, it "speaks a various language." Into each till it drops its jingling coin; that is the only song Senator Copeland would have to harp to get an audience for this fruit. Every banker knows whose cake he eats and whose song he sings; and more than that, he has before him the great contribution the tomato makes to the prosperity and health of this Nation. Mayhap it has no magic to wrest from unwilling exchequers the money needed to finance even a presidential campaign, but it has done such other powerful things it is not beyond its reach to influence another Raskob to emerge from the obscurity that cloaks our multimillionaires and raise a red oriflamme around which other multimillionaires would rally and stack up the ducats.

Thus armed with coin and with respectability, our candidate would have to say something striking to prove that he was no ordinary statesman. He could not remark that the "tomato is a noble experiment," for it has proven itself to be the most practical thing in the world. So as if an afterthought had come to him, he need only refer to the fact that statesmen in this country and in Europe are knitting their brows and pounding their fists over problems the tomato has injected into their thinking. "Benito Mussolini has put his strong hand on the tomato," he would say, "and he has laid on our table one of the most difficult problems Congress has to deal with. It is labeled Pomo die Moro—the Italian tomato." And having fired that shot, he might hint that John Bull and little Cuba and Mexico and all Latin America are watching the game that Benito is playing with Uncle Sam.

PREMIER MUSSOLINI, who has seen the value of tomatoes in Italys progress.

What superstitious reverence and contempt has this little fruit ever been held in! Mussolini is not the first strong, wild man to have been fascinated by it. Portuguese navigators found it in Peru in the fifteenth century and gave it to the Arabs of Morocco, who, nomads though they be, have done agriculture more than one kindly deed. The Arabs introduced it into Europe through Italy, and the Italians called it after the introducer, pomo die Moro, apple of the Moors. The French, with their penchant for altering things, changed its name to pomme d'amour, whence comes our name, love apples.

For a century or two a very old superstition prevailed in the minds of men, that the love apple was "ha'nted," as the darkies say. It was thought to contain evil spirits that passed, when eaten, from the fruit to man and tempted him to violate the eighth commandment. This supposed erotic quality caused a ban to be placed on the fruit, and only recently the belief that tomatoes were poisonous completely died out. It is not without interest that that superstition fell about the time slavery expired on this continent.

Fifty years ago, exactly, the tomato began an experiment that really opened the minds of scientific men the world over to its potentialities. The United States Navy, in July, 1879, sent out its second great Arctic expedition, in the polar ship Jeannette, which was financed by James Gordon Bennett the younger. She was equipped, so far as her food and medical supplies and scientific equipment are concerned, with the best of everything that could be obtained. The Smithsonian Institution, the University of Maryland School of Medicine, noted German scientists and others contributed advice to this end. As she was to be gone two, possibly three, years, and as no ship had ever lived one year in the ice without contracting scurvy, meticulous care was paid to the food selected for a crew of some 34 persons. More because it was a likeable food than for any medicinal value it might have, the ship took on a large quantity of canned tomatoes, put up in California.

For several centuries surgeons in the British royal navy had been studying scurvy, both on the high seas and in their famous hospital near London, and had reached the conclusion that lime juice was the best known antiscorbutic. An order in council had been issued compelling sailing vessels to carry large quantities of this juice, and that gave rise to the nickname British sailors wear to this day, "Limies."

The Jeannette had several barrels of lime juice in her stores, and it was more jealously guarded than the whisky or tobacco. When she foundered and her men made that terrible trek across the ice, they hauled a hogshead of worthless lime juice with them—worthless, because scientific men of this day have demonstrated it to be so.

After her destruction, explorers and scientific men the world over were amazed to learn that the Jeannette passed two years in the ice with no trace of scurvy. This ultimately led to the discovery of the reason for that. Nansen, in "Farthest North," tells how he worked over the problem for years before victualling the Fram for her epochal voyage. She, too, stayed a long time in the ice, suffered much, but had no scurvy. This stimulated the search for the reason why she escaped, and when scientists began to think it was something in the canned tomato that prevented the scurvy, they took the monumental step that climaxed in Funk's finding of the vitamins in 1910.

If the Jeannette had located the North Pole, her contribution to the sum of human intelligence would have been far inferior to the contribution her failure has made to the health and happiness of the human race. If she had taken no tomatoes with her, we might still be in the darkness, and children dying by the hundreds of thousands with the rickets every year.

About the time that Funk announced his discovery, which medical men laughed to scorn, as scientists usually do epochal discoveries, this country began to develop an appetite for tomatoes out of season This was, perhaps, one of the finest evolutions that has followed the unfolding of the greatness of the tomato. No vegetable grown is more seasonable. It is very tender and can not stand the shock of cold weather. A semitropical climate is needed for its cultivation, for it is a native of the tropics. Another of its peculiarities is that it does not stand much handling, long shipment, or cold storage. These were rather stiff handicaps for the grower to overcome to supply fresh tomatoes for winter use. But nothing seems impossible to the ingenuity of the American mind.

After some investigation it was found that winter tomatoes will grow in Cuba, the Bahamas and other West Indies islands, and in old Mexico. For a dozen years or more Florida has been experimenting with this crop on the southern tip of the peninsula, and California conducted similar experiments in the lower reaches of that State. Texas growers in the Rio Grande Valley tested it out there. Florida has persevered, while Texas and California have returned to the seasonable vegetable.

Ghosts Guard "Treasure Cache"

Granite House, Old Home of Gen. Butler Reputed to Hold Hidden Wealth; Razing of Structure for New House Office Building Will Reveal Accuracy of Biographies on Stormy Civil War Officer.

By P. L. PLYLER.

MOST Washingtonians are of course familiar with the history of Granite House—a spacious, somber-hued structure that looms at the intersection of New Jersey avenue and B street southeast. It stands just across the street from the present House Office Building and within a block of the Capitol. In fact, many old-timers can remember when Granite House was built, for it is not so very old, some 50-odd years or nighabout. Mention of the stately granite structure recalls the somewhat stormy career of the builder—Maj. Gen. Benjamin Franklin Butler. In consequence, reminiscences of the Civil War and the role which Gen. Butler essayed in that bitter struggle follow as a natural sequence.

Granite House was erected by Gen. Butler about a decade after the end of the Civil War. As a matter of fact, three residences were contained within the edifice, one of which he occupied for several years while serving as a representative to Congress from Massachusetts. When Granite House was completed, and for several years thereafter, it ranked as one of the finest residential buildings in Washington. Tradition has it that the granite was brought from quarries in Vermont, and that only men who hailed from the Bay State were permited to work on the job. The structure undoubtedly represents a piece of master workmanship, and the materials used in its construction were the best that the market afforded. Particularly is this true of the interior, with its exquisitely railed stairways and the spacious rooms with their ornate trim. At that time it was no doubt the last word in residential construction and, for that matter, it is doubtful if many recently built dwellings would equal it.

Although the exterior of the edifice is unusually plain and minus any ornamentation whatsoever, the interior represents all that the heart could desire in the way of a home. In fact, the bathrooms and closets are larger than the average room contained in present day dwellings. Gen. Butler may have copied the square four-story and basement design from a quaint old building in New Orleans. Peradventure it is a replica of some staid old New England house. Be that as it may, the days of Granite House are numbered. It must be razed shortly to make room for a new House Office Building soon to be erected on the site.

The question that is uppermost in the minds of the curious is, "will the secret cache of Gen. Butler's treasure be revealed when Granite House comes tumbling down?" The fanciful tale of his treasure chest had its origin in New Orleans, coming as an aftermath of his regime as provost marshal of the city during the Civil War. Among the multitude of unpardonable sins saddled onto him by the citizenry was the confiscation of an enormous quantity of money, silverware and jewelry. This included silver spoons, knives and forks, dishes, platters and so on, emblazoned with the crescent design. It was also alleged that he appropriated wagon loads of gold and silver ingots; rings, brooches, vases, pins, gold-framed pictures and other venerable heirlooms. Many of the rare old coins were reputed to have been brought originally from France and Spain to New Orleans by early explorers. It is this heterogenous collection of valuables, safely locked in a heavy iron-bound vault, that scores of people in the South expect to see unearthed when Granite House is razed.

Peradventure belief in the hidden treasure is purely imaginary. Nevertheless the tale persists. Speculation is rife as to the exact location of the vault. Some say one place; some say another. But on one point all seem to be agreed; its sides are literally bursting with wealth untold that would excite the avariciousness of Old Man Croesus himself. Perchance there is a secret panel somewhere in the massive walls that have thwarted its discovery ere now. Perhaps the spacious cellar, securely locked with hugs granite blocks, set in impenetrable cement mortar, has kept the secret these 60-odd years. Maybe the silver spoons and priceless jewels are contained in a ponderous subterranean compartment, submerged in a fathom or two of chilly water at the very bottom of a deep well that was sealed by the owner when the cache was made. So far, diligent search has revealed nothing.

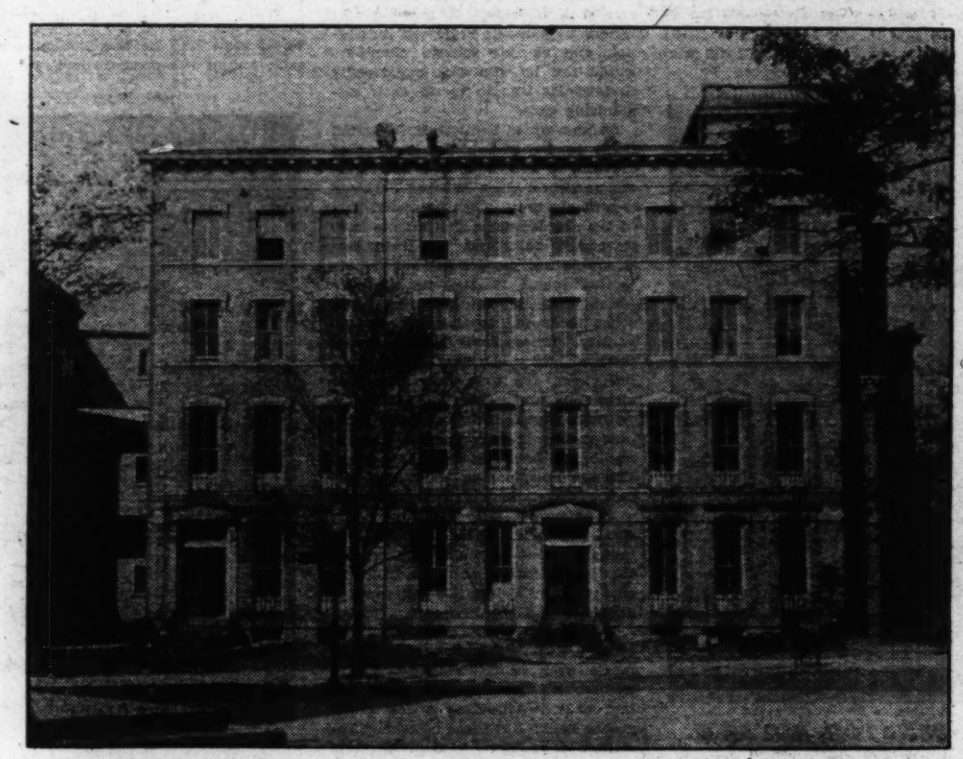
But who wants to unearth this treasure chest, when invisible guards stand ready at all times to strike any one dead who attempts to remove it? Gray-clad ghosts stalked Gen. Butler when he transported the clanking iron chest from New Orleans to Washington and hid it within or underneath Granite House. They have faithfully kept the vigil for more than half a century. Contrary to the capricious habits of goblins in general, these apparitions have refrained from rendering themselves visible. This strange behavior on the part of the shades has led many to doubt the tale of the hoarded wealth. It is indeed stretching the imagination to the tearing point for even the most credulous to swallow a story about hidden gold unless the potential hiding place is haunted occasionally by grotesque phantoms. Meantime these spectral forms will never be observed by human eyes until some one disturbs the rusty vault entrusted to their care.

What is the value of the jewels and the coin and the plate? Nobody knows. Hence the intensified curiosity to behold what the razing of Granite House will reveal. Then this elusive mystery will be definitely solved. The allegations against Gen. Butler will positively be substantiated or forever disapproved.

The biography of Maj. Gen. Benjamin Butler has been written from two entirely different points of view, depending largely upon which side of the Mason and Dixon line the chroniclers had cast their lot. In the North, he was a respectable barrister, prominent in political affairs, wielded a powerful influence and commanded an extraordinary following. Possessing a natural proclivity for politics, he was rapidly forging to the front at the outbreak of the Civil War. Quick to proffer his services to the Union he was assigned to duty as commandant of Fort Monroe, and later appointed provost marshal of New Orleans. Evidently Gen. Butler possessed ideas of his own concerning military activities. Almost from the very day he set foot in New Orleans he accepted service with the Federal Army until the end of the struggle, he was enmeshed in charges and counter-charges, alleging violation of virtually every rule of civilized warfare. Furthermore, it was persistently charged that he had appropriated private property to his own personal use. After the war, though, he explained to the entire satisfaction of a congressional investigating committee that he had not profited personally from any of the contraband of war. The committee therefore completely exonerated him of all allegations. In this connection, it will be recalled, Gen. Butler considered everything within the Confederacy that the Federal soldiers could get their hands on, even including fugitive slaves who took refuge within the Union lines, as contraband of war. He unquestionably considered any action which tended to preserve the Union as fully justified. That he was a rebel hater of the first water there is no doubt. In consequence, most Northern writers have defended his military career, including the provost marshalship of New Orleans, depicting him generally as a popular military hero.

In the South, Gen. Butler was undoubtedly the most bitterly hated officer in the Union Army, not even excepting Gen. William Tecumseh Sherman. Southern pens have almost invariably pictured him as a martinet—a self-styled dictator whose audacity knew no bounds. President Jefferson Davis, of the Confederacy, proclaimed Butler a common outlaw and ordered him immediately executed in the event of his capture. But he did not face a firing squad. Because of Butler's alleged confiscation of their silverware, citizens of New Orleans dubbed him "Silver Spoon" Butler. There he is still designated by that appellation. Mothers still quiet refractory children with the terse warning, "Silver Spoon" Butler will get you if you don't behave." Thus for more than fifty years Butler's name has been a veritable anathema to the people of the South, particularly to those of the Crescent City. Although few persons who knew Gen. Butler personally live to tell the story, the thrilling narrative of his alleged atrocities has not been forgotten. Nor will it be lost to memory soon. In truth, the story will be handed down from generation to generation for many decades yet to come. When a prominent citizen of the Crescent City was questioned recently concerning the present attitude of the people toward Gen. Butler, he declined to discuss the issue, avowing that no newspaper or magazine would dare publish it. One Southern writer, however, gives Gen. Butler due credit for cleaning up the city, as well as the return of a silver teapot when he discovered that it was only plated.

When Admiral Farragut captured New Orleans the Confederates were nonplused. They had been confident that the steel barriers stretched across the river were impregnable. Besides, torpedoes had been planted in the vicinity of the heavy cables. But Farragut said, "Damn the torpedoes! Go ahead!" Consequently the barriers burst and the city was taken. Gen. Butler was then appointed provost marshal. Apparently he was not received with any marked degree of courtesy on the part of the citizenry. According to the records, he evidently figured that only drastic measures would suffice. His conception of war coincided exactly with Gen. Sherman's definition. "It was worse than hell," averred many who incurred his displeasure. He ruled the city with an iron hand; he was the court of last appeal. Once sentence had been imposed, it was as irrevocable as the ancient laws of the Medes and Persians. And woe unto any one who dared to question his absolute authority. As Gen. Butler invariably left a loophole through which to crawl, he evidently harbored a premonition that he would have a lot of explaining to do afterward. He enumerated the citizens so that the status of their loyalty to the Union could be determined and recorded. This registration served to legalize, according to his interpretation of contraband of war, the subsequent seizure of property from self-avowed Confederates. As only a small percentage of the population swore allegiance to the Federal Government, virtually all property in the city was subject to confiscation. Many of the finest old homes were commandeered as quarters for the general and his commissioned officers.



Granite House on New Jersey avenue, formerly the home of Gen. Ben Butler, which will be razed to make room for the new House Office Building. It is said to contain much hidden wealth.

Ultimately the women of New Orleans proved to be the provost marshal's Nemesis. One day as Admiral Farragut, attired in full dress uniform, was walking jauntily along the street, a bucketful of muddy water descended upon his head from a balcony above. It was tilted by a woman's hand. Butler could not brook the dousing of a fellow officer and other alleged hostile acts that had been perpetrated by the women. Then came his famous "Woman Order"—General Order No. 28. That proved to be the straw that broke the camel's back. His action was vigorously denounced in London and Paris. It stirred up a veritable hornet's nest in the South. Verily Gen. Butler had cast a boomerang that was destined to rebound with a vengeance, ultimately resulting in his recall. Soon reports on Butler's repressive tactics began to trickle into Washington. That they should reach the ears of the President was inevitable. So Lincoln took the bull by the horns, summoned Butler to Washington and sent Gen. Banks to relieve him. Before taking his departure from the city, Gen. Butler delivered a somewhat lengthy valediction, in which he endeavored to justify his regime. Then he set out to present his side of the case to the President. The subsequent conference precipitated one of the stormiest scenes witnessed at the White House during the war. Butler bluntly demanded that he be sent back to New Orleans to finish the job. Lincoln had his way. Consequently Gen. Butler decided not to return to the Crecent City.

When the congressional investigating committee exonerated Gen. Butler, he resigned his commission in the Army, returned to Massachusetts and renewed his political activities. Prior to the war he was a Democrat and served as a delegate to the party's national conventions, but broke with the organization over the question of secession. In this connection, it will be recalled, he advocated the arrest, trial on charges of treason and, if convicted, the hanging of the commission from South Carolina which presented the ordinance of secession at the White House. However, the plan did not appeal to President Buchanan and his Attorney General. Butler now sought election to Congress as a representative from the Bay State on the Republican ticket. The venture proved successful. He was elected and served five terms in the House. Doubtless many Washingtonians will recall the stentorian voice of Gen. Butler, as he debated weighty problems on the floor of the House. Regardless of his other short-comings, if any, he is reputed to have been a forceful and convincing speaker. While he was a member of Congress, Gen. Butler served as one of the managers appointed by the House to conduct impeachment proceedings against President Johnson.

Switching from national to State politics, Gen. Butler was elected Governor of Massachusetts in 1882. Then in 1884 he threw his hat into the ring as a candidate for President on the Greenback and Anti-Monopolist ticket. The campaign was conducted from headquarters maintained in Granite House. As Grover Cleveland, the first successful Democratic presidential candidate since the Civil War, was returned the victor, the White House doors never swung open to admit Gen. Butler. But it would be interesting to know how many votes he polled in the South. Thereafter he lived—almost a decade—dying in 1893 while attending court in Washington.

Moreover, the history of Granite House is interesting because it was for several years the Capital home of Senator John Percival Jones, of Nevada, familiarly known as the "silver king." He represented the Sage Brush State in the Senate from 1873 to 1903—30 years of continuous service—ranking as one of Nevada's foremost citizens, as well as an outstanding national figure. It was Mrs. Jones who set the tongues of Washington society wagging because she chose to bake her own biscuits. Meantime, if the subsequent gossip reached the ears of Senator and Mrs. Jones, it failed to ruffle their equanimity. The senator elicited further comment by converting one room of his house into a barber shop for his own personal use. That at the time was considered as about the last word in service de luxe.

Born in England, Jones emigrated to this country with his parents while he was a small urchin. When gold was discovered in California in 1849 he hit the trail for the West. Settling later in Nevada, he developed some of the richest gold and silver mines in the State. An ardent anti-monopolist, he championed the cause of the common people in Congress. His great speech on the floor of the Senate in 1874 on the banking and currency bill attracted Nation-wide attention.

The somewhat unique manner in which Senator Jones relieved a mining camp in California of Old Poison is still being talked about. Old Man Joggles, an odd character from Arkansas, possessed a mean, vicious horse—a regular fighting devil—that seemed to enjoy nothing else quite so well as attacking and mopping up the earth with other horses at the camp. Neither persuasion nor lucrative offers would induce Old Man Joggles to part with the horse. Cognizant of the lever power of the jaws of a jackass, Jones bought a long-eared specimen from a Mexican and brought it to the camp. Old Man Joggles was in ecstasy. Old Poison would naturally eat the critter alive. So sure of the ultimate outcome was Old Man Joggles he wagered $300 that Old Poison would turn the trick. Imagine his chagrin when the jackass chased Old Poison to the edge of a precipice, from which he jumped and wound up with a broken neck on a ledge below. Old Man Joggles was so all-fired mad that he wiped out his six-shooter and shot the jackass dead in its tracks."

Additional interest centers in Granite House because of its connection with one of the Nation's most regrettable tragedies—the assassination of President James A. Garfield by Charles Guiteau, a disappointed office seeker. Vice President Arthur, who succeeded Garfield, made Granite House his abode for six months while Mrs. Garfield was completing arrangements for vacating the White House.

From June 11, 1891, till April 19, 1929, the United States Public Health Service made history in Granite House. During that period rapid strides were made in the field of medical science, particularly in the advancement of preventive medicine. Once the doctor was primarily interested in curing the disease. Now he is chiefly concerned about locating the cause of the ailment. The history of the Public Health Service is a thrilling narrative of an unrelenting battle against disease. A bureau of the Treasury Department, it had its origin in the old Marine Hospital Service, authorized by Congress in 1798. Then the Marine Hospital fund was obtained by taxing the wages of seamen employed on American vessels 20 cents a month each. Appropriations were later made direct from the Treasury. The initial Marine Hospital was erected at Norfolk, Va., in 1800, and the building program continued till hospitals had been provided for all important ports of entry. From the above-mentioned status in the early days of the Republic evolved the Public Health Service of the present. Congress now annually appropriates more than $10,000,000 to finance its activities, and about 9,000 persons are employed by the bureau. American seamen are still being cared for in marine hospitals, but numerous other duties have been assumed.

For the advancement of research and educative work, Congress in 1902 authorized the establishment of a hygiene laboratory, which now ranks as one of the foremost medical research institutions in the world. Situated on an eminence overlooking the Potomac River, adjoining the Marine Hospital in Washington, this laboratory is manned by the Nation's most skillful experts. Moreover, it is equipped for conducting virtually every known medical experiment. The efficient control of such dread maladies as smallpox, yellow fever, diphtheria, bubonic plague and so on, indicates the remarkable achievements that have been accomplished in this respect. That the medical profession may benefit therefrom, results of research activities are published in both bulletins and medical journals. Besides scores of bulletins relating to general health and sanitation problems are distributed throughout the country annually.

The various divisions of the Public Health Service are now quartered in widely scattered buildings throughout Washington, though a suitable building site has been approved by the Fine Arts Commission. Administrative officials ardently hope that a permanent structure, adequate to house the entire personnel, will soon be forthcoming.

Meanwhile erection of the new House Office Building on the present site of Granite House will mark a forward step in the extensive building program of the Federal Government in Washington. In addition to providing members of the House with adequate office accommodation, this stately edifice will greatly improve the grounds adjacent to the south front of the Capitol. Including the site, the structure will cost more than $7,000,000 and will occupy the entire square to the west of the present House Office Building, with which it will be connected by subterranean tunnels; and likewise with the Capitol. Under the general supervision of David Lynn, architect of the Capitol, and the House Office Building Commission, plans are being prepared by the Allied Architects of Washington, D. C., Inc. The design has already been approved by the Fine Arts Commission.

Speaker Nicholas Longworth, Representative Isaac Bacharach, of New Jersey, and Representative John Garner, of Texas, comprise the House Office Building Commission. The Allied Architects of Washington, D. C., Inc., is an organization composed of 35 of the leading architects of the District of Columbia. Frank Upman is president; Louis Justment, vice president; Horace Peasley, secretary, and Edward W. Donn, jr., chairman of the committee on designs. A central office is maintained at 16 Jackson place. This cooperative organization affords member architects to specialize in particular branches of the work. For instance: designing, engineering, construction supervision, specification writing and so on. Thus the futility of endeavoring to fit square pegs in round holes is obviated.

Dimensions of the House Office Building, which will front on B street southeast follow:

B street, 136 feet 2½ inches; C street, 220 feet 8 inches; South Capitol street, 423 feet 8 inches, and New Jersey avenue, 402 feet 3 inches. It will be seven stories high at the front and nine stories at the rear. The front door will open into a spacious lobby, adjacent to a general assembly hall with a seating capacity of about 450 persons. The building will contain 250 suites of offices, consisting of a large work room, private office, and a storage room for books, files and stationery. In keeping with the Capitol and other Government buildings, the architecture will be of the early Federal style. The base will be of granite and the superstructure of white marble. Throughout the building will be exceptionally well lighted and ventilated.

The present House Office Building, erected in 1908 at a total cost of more than $4,000,000, contains 482 rooms, which, with the exception of suites of offices for the various House committees, are single. One-room offices have proven to be unsatisfactory, inasmuch as representatives are not afforded private offices. When the building was erected frames were set for connecting doors, hence these offices can easily be arranged to conform to the ones in the new building.

Members of the upper House are quartered in their own magnificent Senate Office Building, which was built at a total cost of nearly $4,500,000, occupies an entire square and contains 283 rooms. About the only difference in conveniences enjoyed by members of both houses is that senators ride to and from the Senate Office Building and the Capitol, while representatives have to hoof it. The full significance of the additional conveniences afforded by the office buildings can be appreciated when it is recalled that members of both houses formerly rented offices in the city wherever they were available.

Demolition of Granite House and other buildings on the site, which will get under way as soon as bids received by the architect's office are approved by the House Office Building Commission, will mark the initial step toward construction of the new building. Actual construction is expected to begin some time next spring. Upon its completion Uncle Sam's national representatives will be as conveniently quartered, if not more so, as any other similar body in the world. May the shades which guard Gen. Butler's treasure chest never molest them.

and Boston, where they are ripened for the market. A few cars from Florida go to the same markets and a few to Chicago and Detroit, which are the great primary market for the Mexican tomato. For these markets there is a lively contest, with Florida fighting all imported tomatoes, and with Cuba, Bahama and Mexico fighting Florida. Americans own the foreign industry, just as they do the Cuban sugar industry, and that gives joy to the battle. This is one of the problems of the versatile tomato that is making Senator Copeland's confreres knit their brows and swear under their breaths.

In the initial primary markets for the winter tomato the ripening and marketing of the fruit has developed a new and rather wonderful industry. The fruit is plucked green and as carefully inspected and packed as are the finest of Western apples. When it reaches the processors, they handle it as carefully as the original packers did, and cull out every tomato that shows the least sign of ripening. The fruit is then placed in the ripening room, electrically heated with regulated temperature, and carried from one degree of temperature to a higher until at the end of seven to ten days it is fully ripe and ready for the table. This is an application of the old annealing process once used in the manufacture of lamp chimneys, and it would not be possible if electric heat were not available.

Although Florida as yet grows but few cars of tomatoes in the four winter months, her ambition is so great to grow every tomato eaten in this country in those months that she changed her politics in the last election as a preliminary step in that direction. Unless she gets exclusive control of the market, she can not achieve her heart's desire. It was her tomato growers, who are located in Ruth Bryan Owen's district, who asked that lady to vote for the Hawley tariff bill, which she graciously did. If it had been turnips or radishes, Mrs. Owen might well have followed in the steps of her great father and voted with her party.

Whether it be the bonnet the shop girls of America are wearing or the sauce the Italians of America are using, Benito Mussolini sees in both many, many dollars for his country. While American hat makers were asleep he captured the bonnet market; but he did not have to wake up his countrymen over here to get the sauce trade. He knew it was his without the asking. And if any reader of this article is by now not convinced that the tomato has tremendous power, let him harken to the story of Benito and his pomo die Moro. As it is unfolded, one can well believe the old superstition that it is bewitched. The Italian loves his little pear-shaped pomo die Moro with all the intense love the Puritan of New England has for his maple syrup. If you had said to Calvin Coolidge that he could not have his cakes and maple syrup for breakfast at the White House, he would have resigned his great office. And if you should take from New England her maple trees; or if by chance some insect like the Mediterranean fly should render them barren, all of the original Puritan stock would migrate to Canada, or New England would die of starvation and humiliation. Thus does the Italian, whether in Italy or in America, "on land or sea, where'er he may be," love his Italian tomato. The only other race of human beings that will eat the pomo die Moro are the English. When Mr. Hoover was selling everything made and grown in this country to everybody he chalked up but one failure—the British would not buy nor eat American tomatoes. They assigned as a reason that the little Italian tomato does not go to pieces when cooked, and it is so handy in making sandwiches or when eaten as a relish, like preserved figs, for instance. It was our cousins in the tight little island who established the custom of serving tomatoes as a dessert. Anything is possible to them after that.

The Italian importers in New York have wasted fortunes, they say, trying to get Americans to eat the canned pomo die Moro. They have repacked them, relabeled them, and reeverything to them, but to no avail. Unless they have the picture of the big red tomato on the label, they "just ain't fit to eat." That's the American attitude. And the Italian is just as obstinate about the big, red American tomato. So the American canners say.

The pomo die Moro is sweetish to the taste, is lacking in acid, and has all the appearance of never having grown up. It seems to be in a constant state of arrested development. But centuries of use have made it bone and blood and sinew of the Italian. This was Benito's starting point.

With reports before him, carefully gathered showing how many million of his nationals were living in America, he quickly figured out how many million pounds of tomatoes and tomato paste should be moving in Italian ships to America. The industry could not supply it and the domestic trade, too, he was informed. Well, then, the industry would have to be rebuilt, and more tomatoes planted. That would give more work for idle Italian labor, more dollars for Italian industry, and more revenue for Benito's government.

This far-sighted statesman actually scrapped the Italian canning industry, sent to America and purchased the latest canning machinery, and then organized the Canning Trade Institute, which operates very much like similar institutes do in this country. Through it he has stabilized the price of Italian tomatoes, and through it he has gone after world markets for Italian products. Last year, for instance, he shipped to America 90,000,000 pounds of tomatoes and tomato paste. This is but 10 per cent of the country's consumption. But it is more per cent than American canners like to see coming in. So they have posed another problem for Senator Copeland's confreres to knit their brows over. As Benito buys his tin plate from America, and likewise his machinery, his craftiness as a statesman is obvious. He could just as easily purchase them in England, where they eat his tomatoes. But there are not many Italians in England.

It does not take very long to figure out what would happen if the pomo die Moro were shut out of this country. That is the visible problem of practical politics that is hidden in this lovely love apple. Our statesmen will muddle through it in some way, hoping always that some day all of the Italian will be bred out of Benito's Nationals in America and that when they all become marked with all the attributes of real Americanism they will eat anything and every thing grown in this great land that is a refuge for so many of them.

Native Americans love their love apples so much that they agree with Senator Copeland in his desire to protect the fruit from pests of all sorts, insects, political, diplomatic, commercial and what not. Next to woman, it seems to be God's best gift to man. Some of us can get along without woman, but none of us can live without our tomatoes.

Charting the Nation's Skyways

Aeronautic "Road Maps" Now Show Proper Altitude at Which Flying Is Safe; Charts Expected to Avert Disaster for Planes Flying Over Mountains; Preparations Made for Day of "Flivver" Aircraft.

By ROY GRIFFITH.

THE recent catastrophe which befell the palatial T. A. T. air liner City of San Francisco is a striking example of the prime necessity of correct airway charts being carried by pilots of airplanes. The City of San Francisco crashed into the side of Mount Taylor, in New Mexico, sacrificing eight lives. Five hundred feet higher altitude would have saved her. Airway charts show all altitudes in bold color tints which can not be mistaken.

This is not to say that the pilot of the ill-fated craft did not carry a chart of his route. It has been said that he was caught in a heavy storm and either could not climb to a higher altitude or else that he lost his way and thought he had already passed the towering slopes of Mount Taylor. Nevertheless, it remains true that crashing into a mountainside might be the fate of any airplane pilot unless he had a chart showing the correct altitudes of the ground beneath him.

The aneroid barometer carried by all planes shows height above sea level, not above the ground over which the plane may be flying. Further, the Bureau of Standards has discovered a dangerous "lag" in the aneroid barometer; that is, in a swift glide to earth it might show as much as a thousand feet altitude when the plane reached the ground, even at approximate sea level. The Bureau of Standards has done much to remedy this "lag," but it still persists in some degree.

The airway charts produced by the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey and distributed by the aeronautic branch of the Department of Commerce, indicate the elevations in general by different color tints, called gradients, following the same general scheme as that used on the world map now being constructed by international agreement on a scale of 1-1,000,000, the difference being that, in order to attain simplicity and avoid confusion, the airways charts use a lesser number of tints. Seven tints, or gradients, are used, as contrasted with twelve on the world map.

The Government's airway charts use green tints for lower altitudes and brown for higher elevations. The deepest tint of green is used for elevations from sea level to 1,000 feet. The highest altitudes are indicated by the deepest tint of brown. The means elevations of 9,000 feet or more. In between these two are tints indicating elevations of 1,000, 2,000, 3,000, 5,000, 7,000 and 9,000 feet. In addition, the charts show contour lines at intervals of 500 feet marked by figures showing elevation above sea level.

The air pilot must also, of course, consult his barometer in order to find out his height above the ground underneath. The reading on the barometer minus the elevation shown on his chart in his true distance above the ground.

This matter of altitude, while vitally important, is by no means the only information which the pilot gleans from his air chart. In addition to showing him the elevation of the ground beneath him, it also enables him to tell "where he is at" at any time. It is a modified automobile road map, so to speak, except that the "road" it shows is a road through the air—a most desirable sort of road, not being cluttered with detour signs or speed regulations or the dust of a car ahead.

The air chart shows rivers, railroads, principal highways, cities, towns and such other topographic features as may be readily identified by the air pilot. It shows landing fields, both regular and emergency; that is, airports and auxiliary fields. It indicates the line of flight, the magnetic courses, the magnetic variation from true north, beacons and radio stations with their call letters.

It is well known that the magnetic compass does not, in general, point true north. That is why the magnetic variation from true north is shown upon the chart. Compass flying alone would, in most cases, put a plane off its course, even allowing for wind drift. This, and the limitations of the aneriod barometer, is fairly good evidence that instrument flying, or flying by means of instruments alone, is something to be resorted to only in emergency.

The radio beacon, a part of the instrumental equipment of instrument flying, is invaluable for flying in fog or adverse weather conditions. In effect, the radio beacon lays down a beam of radio and, by means of a visual indicator on the plane, the pilot can tell at a glance whether or not he is on a true course. This, however, does not tell him his location; location finders of various sorts have been developed, but the pilot is, to a large extent, handicapped in their use because of the speed at which the airplane travels.

All instrumental equipment is valuable in promoting the safety of flying, but, in the opinion of Government experts, the air chart has a place of its own which can not be filled by anything else. It not only serves to keep the plane at a safe distance from the ground, but also shows the pilot his exact location.

Government worker drawing charts which show proper altitudes at which it is safe for aviators to fly in all sections of the country.

The aeronautics branch of the Department of Commerce some time ago suggested that names of all towns should be painted in bold letters on the tops of one or more buildings in each town. At the present time the majority of the towns and cities to which the suggestion was made have complied with it. A few hundred towns, according to a recent statement of the Department of Commerce, have so far ignored the suggestion. Since the names of all towns are shown on the air chart the value of such cooperative effort on the part of towns and cities is readily apparent. Oftentimes a pilot who has flown out of his course has adopted the dangerous expedient of flying low enough to read the small name painted on the railroad station of some town.

One of the most important things to be decided in the preparation of air charts is the amount of detail to be shown. The tendency is to show too much rather than too little detail. Only the main features are ordinarily shown on such a chart, so that the pilot may be enabled to go from one objective to another without paying much attention to intermediate details. The features that may be identified in desert regions of the Southwest, for example, are few and far between, so that all of them, even individual ranch houses, may be shown. On the other hand, in the thickly settled regions along the Atlantic seaboard the question is one of eliminating features rather than of trying to secure a sufficient number.

In the matter of chart detail, Raymond L. Ross, chief of the airways mapping section of the U. S. Coast and Geodetic Survey, said when interviewed recently: "Airways charts should be very clear and not burdened with too many details. Certain features should be emphasized. Railroads should be boldly shown, since their routes are more direct than the highways and are less concealed by overhanging foliage. Also, in the winter time the railroad tracks are kept freer from snow, thus making dark lines across a white field which is helpful to the pilot in keeping his way.

"Another feature to be emphasized is the main through highway. While it is not so good a guide as a railroad track, it is useful in many ways. A conspicuous highway may parallel a railroad for miles and then take a different course. The point of departure from the railroad may be seen on the map and noted on the ground as the pilot passes over it. By repeated trips, the point becomes fixed in his mind. The systems of highways and railroads, together with large streams, make an ever-changing pattern as the airplane passes along. This furnishes a helpful picture providing the pattern on the air chart is true to the picture on the ground.

"A difficulty met with in the process of exaggerating the width of main highways and using a heavy black line for railroads on the map is that of trying to keep the proper relationships of surrounding features. In general, however, the value of the emphasis more than offsets certain minor crowding-out of position of some features.

"The features which may be subdued or omitted from the air chart are small streams and the multitude of second and third class highways. These confuse rather than help in air navigation. In a rapidly moving plane, the eye of the observer is unable to compare many details of a complex map with the corresponding details on the ground. By the time he has partly figured out his whereabouts, the picture on the ground has changed and he may be lost again."

Another reason for simplicity of detail in airway charts is seen in the fact that they carry, in addition to names and locations of towns and cities, symbols for airports with notations telling the pilot whether they are equipped with flood lights, border lights and other aids for night landing; they carry symbols showing facilities for landing of lighter-than-air craft, such as the Graf Zeppelin, and they show the location of radio stations, together with their call letters. Mr. Ross says, "Recent developments in radio stations, radio compass stations and directive radio beacons threaten to complicate the airway chart if it is attempted to show them all. In places, it will be practically impossible to group all the various letters and symbols around an airport symbol; the Department of Commerce bulletins will have to be consulted for this information.

The airway charts of the Department of Commerce which are in use today are what are called "strip maps." They are uniformly 11 inches wide and need be folded in only one direction. Thus they are easily handled in an airplane. The lengths of the charts vary from 24 to 48 inches. All charts are on a scale of 1-500,000, or about 8 miles to 1 inch. Each chart, therefore, represents an area approximately 80 miles wide and from 200 to 400 miles long. Some of the charts have border sketches showing the detailed layout of landing fields.

A recent development in air charts are the "square" charts covering three degrees of latitude and four degrees of longitude. These will be practically square in the vicinity of the thirty-ninth parallel of latitude; because of the converging of longitude lines toward the north and south poles, they will become more and more oblong as areas farther north or south are covered.

Some authorities claim that the true "strip map" will not be economical as additional air routes are charted, because so many of the charts will cross each other and duplicate effort on the part of the chart makers. Again, the volume of miscellaneous flying; that is, flying by private planes off the regular routes, has increased enormously in the past few years and will continue to increase as more and more earth-hugging humans discover the delights of air travel. For these reasons, it is predicted that the time is not far distant when all air charts will be of the "square" variety.

The air charts of the Government are today being produced by the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Air Corps of the Army, and the Hydrographic Office of the Navy. These three organizations are embarked upon ambitious programs which, within a comparatively short time, will see the United States covered with a veritable network of accurate airway charts. Many other Government bureaus are furnishing map material from which the airways charts are being compiled. The topographic maps of the U. S. Geological Survey, maps of the Bureau of Public Roads, the Forest Service, the General Land Office, the Bureau of Chemistry and Soils of the Department of Agriculture, and charts of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Hydrographic Office are all being consulted in order that Federal air charts may be as complete and accurate as possible.

The charting of an airway ordinarily follows a survey by engineers of the Airways Branch of the Bureau of Lighthouses. They fly over a proposed route and select suitable sites for revolving and flashing beacons for night flying and also choose locations for possible intermediate landing fields. Beacons are usually placed at intervals of about 10 miles and intermediate fields about 30 miles apart along the route.

After this has been completed the chart makers get busy. An air chart compilation is prepared from the best available material. Photographic copies of the compilation are mounted on cloth, taken to the field and checked. The checking is done by a trained engineer, who flies as an observer with an experienced pilot. Several trips are made back and forth across the region being charted, the compilation is corrected and goes back to the chart makers, and the compilation is inked in and prepared for final printing.

At least ten bureaus and departments of the Government have a part in producing the airway charts by means of which all of us may some day pilot our own little "flivver" planes as easily as we now steer our autos over the highways of Mother Earth with the aid of automobile road maps. It is just a question of time, and not a very long time, at that, when the individual "flivver" plane will be a reality and we will all be "up in the air."

Famous Pets of Famous People

the boy Poe's memory. He hated John Allan from that day and the man was powerless to guide him from the temptations that constantly beset him in succeeding years.

He went off to bed lost in the pained, bitter reflections of the friendless. But suddenly a comforter came to him. There was a scratching at the door, which he had closed but not latched. In a moment it was thrust open by a fuzzy nose. Quickly Comrade leaped across the floor, sprang to his side, licked his face and then nestled warmly down beside him.

He went to sleep dreaming of the morrow when he and the spaniel would tramp the countryside and perhaps swim the river.

All his life pets played a part in Edgar Allan Poe's existence. No matter how reduced his circumstances, there was almost always on hand some bird or beast to comfort and entertain him.

Years later, in the destitution of the little Fordham home outside New York City, we find his pets providing almost the sole high light against the somber background of disease and sorrow.

Virginia, his wife, was dying and his own health was wretched. Amid this misery, he had scarce any comfort but to distract his mind with the bobolink he had himself caught and caged, his favorite cat, and a parrot a friend had given him. And after Virginia had passed on he needed to turn to them again.

His cat was a huge tortoise-shell one. In the last hours of Virginia's life it played a useful role. The sick-room was insufficiently heated. There were not enough covers on the bed. The cat, nestling against the poor young wife's wasted form, helped to keep her warm.

By-Paths of the Nation's Capital

Society's Battles in the Capital Date Back Far Beyond the Gann-Longworth Controversy, Says a Veteran Observer; Dieting and Dates for Receptions Were Causes for Upheavals Which Shook Washington.

By BUCK BRYANT.

WASHINGTON has had many social upheavals. They have been favorite pastimes here for many years. Ever since Andrew Jackson's day there have been outbreaks over "Who is Who" in society, and in the majority of instances, where conflicts arose between government officials and women leaders, the latter won. Vote or no vote, the woman got the best of the controversy; the man had to retreat.

Society leaders here are very sensitive and jealous of their rights. The Dolly Gann affair of this administration was tame compared with similar incidents in the old days, before woman suffrage, when the wives of Presidents, Cabinet members and congressmen had plenty of time for receptions, teas and other functions. In those days they worried but little about politics, political recognition or the Hollywood diet.

Nowadays it is fashionable to be thin at any cost, but this was not so in 1897, the year of my first sojourn in Washington. That was an eating age and men and women delighted to hover around the refreshment table. Entertainers had to put up the bars against crashers. Gluttony was condemned in resolutions and newspaper interviews. Famous women of that day were outspoken in their attacks upon invited or uninvited guests who gobbled up the dainties served.

Mrs. John Sherman, wife of the then Secretary of State, led a movement to cut out refreshments entirely in order to discourage heavy feeders.

During the McKinley regime the wives of members of the Cabinet held an indignation meeting and denounced in unmeasured terms congressmen and the Toms, Dicks and Harrys for raiding their dining rooms, and as a result they adopted a set of new social rules.

In those stirring days, when every one, with a few exceptions, served stimulating beverages, it was not a question of which seat one occupied, but rather how much punch or salad was served. At least that was the way it struck me, a country cracker just come to town, for there was a great uproar after a popular reception.

The fall and winter of 1897 were full of social controversies and the city was in a constant turmoil. President and Mrs. McKinley touched a tender spot when they announced a purpose to restrict the crowds at the White House receptions. Instead of having everybody at once, they divided the social set and invited a group at a time. They required cards of admission, although previously the "at-homes" of the President and First Lady had been free-for-alls. This decision caused a storm, but Mrs. McKinley, supported by the President, won.

The restrictions did not apply to public and New Year receptions, when the doors were opened to all.

But the real outbreak came later, when, without warning, it was stated at the White House that the President and Mrs. McKinley had changed the day of state receptions from Thursday to Wednesday. After the row started it was stated that it had been done to avoid a conflict with prayer-meeting night. The President's private secretary, J. Addison Porter, bore the brunt of that attack. He was charged with the offense, and the riot of words was partially quelled by McKinley's announcement that no formal order putting the change into effect would be made. This seemed to onlookers in the National Capital a small matter, but those interested were all wrought up over it. Society directors outside the White House were angered, as they had long before fixed Wednesday for their weekly receptions; they did not want to give up their own to-dos.

"Should the President adhere to his decision to set apart Wednesday as the day for state receptions," said Mrs. Sherman, "I think we ladies of the Cabinet will be forced to accept the alternative suggested by Mrs. Gage, who proposes that, rather than endure the strain of double duty on Wednesday, we shall abandon our weekly receptions until after the close of the season.

"The chief obstacle to this plan is that, since the official program covers a period of seven weeks, it may carry us into the Lenten season."

"In those days they worried but little about politics, political recognition or the Hollywood diet."

This tornado in Washington social circles gathered force as it went. Soon after it started, persons who had suffered in silence for years over real or imaginary ills chimed in, and the abuse became general. From Mr. Porter, the Cabinet ladies descended upon congressmen. On December 3, 1897, a meeting was held at the home of Secretary of State Sherman, when it was decided that there should be no more free lunches at their functions, and no one without proper card could enter the front gate. A Western woman, the wife of a Cabinet member, suggested that it would be well to discuss needed reforms, and face facts squarely, without fear and trembling. She precipitated the fight on gluttons, which forever after barred them from the flowing bowls and larders of National Capital entertainers. Outspoken and frank, she forced others to be the same. She described some of the guests she had seen at parties as "wolfish in their descent upon the refreshment tables." The motion of this leader to discontinue the spread of viands before men in fine togs, but with ravenous appetites, was supported by every one present. There was a spontaneous outburst of applause at the suggestion.

The refreshment tables at public receptions were described as the most desirable stands in the free-lunch route from Capitol Hill to Cabin John Bridge, which, at that time, passed right by Mades, Fritz Reuter's, Hancock's, Shoomaker's and a score of other drinking places, all of which offered lavish feasts for all who were hungry and thirsty.

As far back as Andrew Jackson's time there was complaint of lingering crowds at the refreshment tables. At one of President Jackson's White House receptions good and strong drinks were served very liberally. Many persons imbibed too freely, became "tight," and refused to leave the building. Some clever schemer suggested that the drinks be carried to the lawn, and in that way draw the crowd out. The plan was adopted and those interested followed as best they could, remaining until the supply gave out.

On another occasion the Chinese Minister gave a party and admitted all who applied. A rush was made on the table and some of the guests pocketed bottles of champagne. The hungry horde, three or four deep, surged about the table, grabbing at everything in sight. Plates were emptied and thrown upon the floor. The host tried to disperse the mob, but all fair means failed. Finally, in desperation, he had fine red pepper sprinkled about the dining room, and only then were his efforts crowned by victory.

"We decided unanimously not to offer any refreshments at our Wednesday receptions," said Mrs. Sherman. "It was thought judicious, partly because, when nothing to eat or drink is given, the crowds are smaller.

"I knew of a congressmen once, who, having received an invitation to a reception, attended and took nine friends with him. Of course, no invitations are issued for Cabinet receptions, they are open to the public. It seems too bad to give up the tea table, which does so much to make an afternoon reception attractive, especially when a number of young girls are assisting. It is pleasant to chat with a few friends over a cup of tea, but the receiving of several hundred persons whom one does not know and who come perhaps as much out of curiosity as for any other motive, is a very different matter.

"From experiences of ladies of former Cabinets, we are led to suppose that the crowds will be much less numerous if no refreshments are provided. Some of the ladies of the last Cabinet stopped serving refreshments before the administration was over.

"You doubtless have heard stories of instances where guests, after disposing of the contents of one plate, would hide it under a curtain or chair and receive another. I think that more than one lady of the last Cabinet had queer experiences of this kind.

"I have been told of receptions in Washington where refreshments were served, and men put salted almonds and candies in their pockets. There was one case where a woman was seen to slip a piece of cake adroitly into her pocket handkerchief, and then perceiving that her action had been noticed, she dropped it on the floor.

"From my own drawing room during a reception a handsome pair of opera glasses disappeared at one time, and on another occasion a valuable fan vanished. Of course, ladies are in the habit of carrying such articles and might have picked them up by mistake."

Mrs. John D. Long, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, said: "The decision (on refreshments) is not to be regarded as an innovation. Some of the ladies of Mr. Cleveland's Cabinet ceased to offer refreshments at their receptions during the latter part of the administration, and from their experiences we are led to believe that the crowds will not be so large if nothing to eat or drink is provided."

Mrs. Joseph McKenna, wife of the Attorney General, declared: "I have heard of dishes being found hidden in all sorts of nooks and corners after the departure of the multitude. If any person wishes to bring a friend he has only to write and ask for an invitation in order to get it, with a card of admission."

The McKinley Cabinet at that time was composed of Messrs. John Sherman, Secretary of State; Lyman J. Gage, Secretary of the Treasury; Russell A. Alger, Secretary of War; Joseph McKenna, Attorney General; James A. Gary, Postmaster General; John D. Long, Secretary of the Navy; Cornelius N. Bliss, Secretary of the Interior, and James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture.

The social season of 1897-98, which started off with so much noise, came to a sudden close because of the death of the mother of the President.

Observers of events in Washington 30-odd years ago realize that "the girls of yesterday" are very much like the girls of today.

About the middle of December, 1897, when Congress was in session, a Washington society girl was arrested at a dog fight which was staged in the stables of the late Senator Shelby M. Cullom, of Illinois. She was cheering on the canines—two bulldogs—when the police raided the place. The police blotter next morning carried a name, but it was not her own. Ten dollars put up as collateral was forfeited.

Well-to-do congressmen in those days brought their own horses and vehicles to Washington. Barns were as plentiful then as garages are now.

Two young men in evening dress and two negro boys in street clothes were arrested and charged with pulling off the contest in the Cullom stables. When discovered, the young woman was seated in a high buggy, where she could have a full view of the battling beasts.

This sensational affair took place at 10 o'clock at night while Senator Cullom and his coachman were driving, and they knew nothing about it. A ring was marked off, the dogs brought in muzzled, and the doors locked. Lanterns were used for light. But, when the minute set for the match arrived, the girl had not shown up. This delay resulted in trouble for the entire party, since it enabled the police to catch on.

As the young woman arrived one of the men who had been the cause of her absence said: "All right, she is here; let the show begin."

The dogs flew at each other's throats, and suppressed exclamations came from the spectators. There was no fake about it; the bulldogs did their best, and were making the fur and blood fly when a bang on the door broke it in, and the police took charge. In the scramble that followed some of the men in their best clothes got away.

The son of a member of the House of Representatives was called upon to appear in court and tell what he knew about the dog fight, but he denied any knowledge of it. No one ever was convicted of the offense which entitled the Government to a fine of $250. Many young men were questioned, but no one could throw any light on the affair in Senator Cullom's stables. The real name of the fair spectator never was brought out. It was said at the time that the young man who escorted her there got away, and never fell into the hands of the officers, but somebody put up $10 for her.

"TAKE HIM for a RIDE!"—By Alan MacDonald

The Tense and Fearsome True Story of a Stoic Young Gangster Who Was Tortured, Shot and Left for Dead on the New Jersey Meadows.

TOM BERTONI came back from a ride—alive. So far as the record of police and press goes, he is the only man who ever has lived to tell the tale of being marked for death by an implacable underworld czar, snatched unexpectedly into an automobile, ridden for miles under taunts and terrorism to "the spot," ruthlessly sprayed with bullets and left for dead. Of being, in effect, a man doomed to die, a dead man fading through the carnival of life.

By all the stark and pitiless rules of those modern Neros, the gangs, Tom Bertoni's body, like hundreds of others reported recently, should have been found beside a lonely road at dawn, grotesquely sprawled, cold and riddled with leaden slugs. But fate gave Tom a break. Why? He himself does not know. The gang leader, having personally put three of six bullets fired from his own gat into his passenger's body while his armed henchmen stood silently by, refrained from sending into Tom's brain the finisher, an established and ultramodern refinement of the standardized technique of ride executions.

Did this gang chief, this automobile Cossack of the Hoboken and Jersey City waterfronts, did he deem the broken lad slumping down against the telegraph pole in the shadows already past need of a finisher? Or was there some sudden strain of pity in his gangster heart—or fear—as he summoned death to his side that moonless June night on remote Moonachie road in the heart of the preternaturally flat, bleak, sparsely cultivated Jersey marshes?

Tom remembers the terrible stillness that followed when the last shot crashed into him. He remembers the confused rushing noises as he slipped slowly down among the weeds, loose-mouthed and wide-eyed and the gang executioners broke for the car. How the henchmen piled in first and the chief waited an instant, looking back, shoving his revolver in a coat pocket. The raucous clash of gears as the black car sped away into the silent gloom. * * *

* * * *

WEEKS later I sat opposite Tom on the porch of an obscure white farmhouse high in the Catskill Mountains. The light from a single, high-powered incandescent in the center of the ceiling beat down upon us. What it did to my face I can not say. But it made of Tom Bertoni's a gray mask, with dark caverns of the heavy shadows his unholy experience had harrowed under his straight, black brows. Out of the depths of these hollows his intent, suspicious eyes burned. When I looked directly at him they burned low—but when I half turned away I caught them blazing and smoldering at me, searching, probing, weighing. It was like being watched by a tiger. In the end, though, he told me, step by step, detail by detail, the story of this amazing ordeal through which he had somehow lived.

A short, stocky man, with powerful, heavy shoulders, he sat hunched forward in his chair, his head with its thick, curly black hair, bent toward me. His voice was methodical, slow, colorless. Now and then he looked at me, but mostly he stared at the floor with a curious abstracted gaze, as though he were seeing again those awful scenes.

As he talked a butterfly moth alighted on my shirt—a big black thing with gold-striped wings. In a pause I said, "That's a beauty—isn't it?"

Tom reached over, picked it up, held it by the tips of its two wings, and watched it flutter for life. The insect became exhausted and hung still. With slow fingers Tom pulled a wing from the body and snapped the moth to the floor, where it died.

* * * *

THE ride began, he related, on a sultry June night about 15 minutes to midnight. Tom was leaning against the bank building at Fifth and Adams streets, Hoboken, fussing with a pocketknife. Two young cronies faced him, talking about the luck in the card game they had just been party to at a social club round the corner. Tom's best friend and inseparable companion had gone home and Tom was thinking of doing likewise. But the night was lazy and he dallied.

The junction of Fifth and Adams streets is the heart of downtown Hoboken, the Italian district, a community of little shops, old-fashioned six-story apartment houses and brooding holes in the walls with covered front windows and doors. Almost all the places were by this time closed, but here and there up the four streets that led to the corners lights still shone, a man or two lounged about, and stragglers drowsed. Save for the three friends, the corner was deserted. It was the hour, too, when the police change posts, and not a cop was in sight.

A black sedan rolled up Adams street, half rounded the corner opposite the bank and stopped. Incuriously, Tom glanced at it, and found himself facing three guns in the hands of its three occupants. He hissed to his pals. He turned to run down Adams street. But he did not take a step. The gang chief was approaching silently only a few feet away. He had been dropped, apparently, down Adams street, and now came up, gun in hand, to cut off any retreat. Tom and his friends were trapped!

Under the name of Tommy Burton, Tom had fought in the prize ring, and was proud of the fact that he never packed a gat. He braced himself against the wall. His two pals waited beside him. Tom recognized the gang chief, of course; he had known the man for years as the leader of an uptown gang, who, with his henchmen, ranged the wharves.

Expertly, the gang chief cut Tom out of the trio. He slapped the pocketknife from Tom's hand. He poked his gun in Tom's back.

"Come on, tough guy, get in the car!"

* * * *

AT a hearse's pace the sedan had by this time swung around to the curb before the bank. Tom shuffled toward the car, ahead of the prodding gun.

A ride! They were going to take him for a ride!

But no—that was impossible! This gang chief was a bad one, but he wouldn't dare kill a man in cold blood. Tom, who never had shown the slightest fear of him, believed always that this gang leader was "yellow" at heart. Perhaps that was what this business was all about. They were never going to try to scare him, Tom, to break his nerve, to make him cringe and whine. Tough guy! That was the tip-off. Well, he'd show 'em. . . .

Confidently enough he climbed into the car, where the gun toters poked and guided him to the back seat, making him sit squarely in the middle. One of the gangsters sat on his left, and the leader piled in on his right, thrusting his gat into Tom's ribs to match the one in the hand of his henchman on the other side. With a jerk the car started.

"We'll send the body back to you," was the message the gangsters flung back to Tom's pals.

* * * *

THE gang chief's voice was more grim and determined than Tom ever had heard it. The captive's heartbeats quickened. Four blocks away, on Willow avenue, short blocks, too, was his home, where his father, brothers and little sisters were either asleep or, probably, preparing for bed. Half a block down Fifth street the members of his own gang with whom he had been playing cards still lounged and talked. Tom shook his head in the dark car. He had played the sap! When he had had the chance, he should have made a break for his freedom; should have cried out and socked this gangster; should never have gotten in the car. They wouldn't have dared to shoot him down. The whole neighborhood would have been aroused. Nice time these bimboes would have had then . . .

The car sped down Adams street. There on the right was the place, where Tom had been working that day, shut and dark. Four days he had had the job—just four days, and now this! He'd be late tomorrow, if he got there at all. . . . It was as if he were leaving everything, all his friends, without a word of explanation. Suppose he never got back? The two guns against his sides were like a cage!

But he must cut this sort of thing . . . He must stand and take it; must not show yellow. . . . Hell! These rats wouldn't have the nerve to kill, or to shoot, even. Still, if he brought his elbows back sharply, he could knock those two gats away, and in a free-for-all he'd take his chances with the four of them—any time! But there was the gun in the hands of the third man, sitting in the front seat beside the driver and turned to face him. . . .

"We just missed $500," growled one of the gangsters. "We gotta get even with somebody."

No one answered.

* * * *

THEY got me wrong, sure, Tom told himself. He strove to recall anything he had done that might be responsible for this attack. Of course, there had been that shooting in the neighborhood between gang members three weeks before. One of the gang chief's particular friends had been hit in the leg, merely grazed at that; but Tom had had nothing whatever to do with that affair. The uptown czar's girl had been slapped across the face by a downtown boy in a dance joint a few days ago. Tom had been present, but he hadn't done the slapping. Had had nothing more to do with it than forty or fifty other dancers. . . . Suppose he told the gang chief the truth; suppose he said they had him wrong? . . .

The hell with 'em, he wouldn't give them that satisfaction. Come what might, he'd take his medicine. Why, these bimboes wouldn't believe him, anyway; they'd think he was trying to lie his way out. . . . Hang 'em, they'd never say he was yellow. He looked up. They had gone only two blocks on Adams street. Yet it seemed an age. The gang chief shoved his gat sharply into Tom's ribs.

"Who shot Smith three weeks ago?" he demanded.

So that was it! They thought he shot the guy or that he knew who did. Well, of course, he knew who did it. But they weren't going to get him, Tom Bertoni, to squeal. Never! He set his lips. Again and again the gang chief poked the gun into his side. Two or three times he repeated his question in Tom's ear. Tom remained as silent as the Sphinx. The gangster flew into a rage. With a sudden snarl he eased his anger by smashing Tom with all his might full in the face. The blow struck just under the right eye. The eye began to swell.

* * * *

TOM'S stomach began to hurt. He felt painfully hungry. The conviction that they actually meant to kill him began to grow on him. A cold sweat broke out all over his body as the car wheeled from Newark into Hoboken avenue, a street of gloomy old warehouses, still and deserted at night. In the murk of this street the car proceeded about two blocks. The driver pulled it around unexpectedly to the other side of the street and stopped. They were heading it, Tom thought, for the getaway.

He sat very still, tense, waiting, watching, trembling. The driver switched out the headlights of the car. The only light in the street was the tiny illumination on the dashboard. Why didn't they talk? Say something? If only that guy in the front seat would look away! Well, they could bump him off, he wouldn't squeal or cringe. Yet . . . they couldn't do this! They had him wrong! But they would, and he'd take it. He thought of his father; could see the old man's face when he read in the morning about this; his father, who had had nothing but hard luck all his life. And his little sister—who played mother to the family since his mother died! Why, why hadn't he gone home with his pal! God, they couldn't go through with this. . . .

"Open that door and pile out."

* * * *

CURIOUSLY, the gangster chief's grim, flat voice snapped him out of all that, and he wasn't sorry. If he had to take it, he'd take it. He had, he says, no desire to fight; he, Tommy Bertoni, the best man with his fists about Fifth and Adams streets.

As quietly as he might push open the door of his home he reached over and opened the door of the car. He must take it like a man! It was here and he must take it. This thought was bright and uppermost in his mind, above a confusion of half-formed, almost hysterical ideas and impulses.

He tried to rise, but they stayed him. Every nerve in his body was taut, he waited to be shot in the car. Head down, he waited. His heart seemed to have stopped. His ears rang. It was agony—waiting. Waiting for the shots. Somehow he almost wanted them. A voice spoke somewhere, slowly, casually, cruelly. But to Tom it was like an explosion.

"D'ye think we oughta beat him up before we shoot him?"

The bums! They weren't going to kill him. They didn't dare. They thought they could make him act yellow! He relaxed against the seat and the guns.

The gangster repeated his question. And Tom sneered. What a lot of palookas!

This angered the gangster chief. He half stood up. Twice he struck Tom in the face, landing on the mouth and the swollen eye. Tom's lip bled. The eye was almost closed. But Tom was not unhappy. These fellows weren't killers. They were yellow, like he thought from the first. And he had called their bluff. He hadn't welched or squealed. Some day they'd pay. . . .

* * * *

THE gang leader slammed the car door suddenly and said: "Go over on the Paterson road."

They drove up Paterson Plank road, out of Hoboken, into the next town, Union City. As they approached the business section the gang chief cautioned the captive against outcry.

"Open your head and we'll kill you on the spot. D'ye hear?"

Of course he heard. He nodded. Why, these jokes were more afraid than he was. All he had to do was to wait—and take it. The restaurants and other places of Union City were still lighted and there were many people on the street. They passed policemen placidly directing traffic or walking their beats. But Tom kept silent. You never could tell. If he made an outcry these bozoes might be frightened into shooting—then what would it matter to him if they were caught? He would probably be dead. * * * No, he'd see the thing through, now.

The car reached open country and speeded up. He calculated they had

MYSTERY OF THE MARIE CELESTE

By WILLIAM M'FEE.

WHEN the bell at Lloyd's in London tolls and a ship long overdue is posted as "missing," there is a solemn hush in the hearts of those who hear and read. Another tragedy of the sea has been consummated. Men and women like ourselves have vanished into the unknown. And it is the same, to a certain degree, with highly documented disasters. Ships burned or wrecked with heavy loss of life are bound to drift into history and literature. They capture our imagination. Nothing ashore can compete with tales of the sea like the wreck of the Grosvenor, the burning of the General Slocum, the foundering of the Birkenhead, the collision of the Camperdown and the Victoria, and the disappearance of the Waratah. All these spectacular affairs have become imbedded in our memories, and the personalities of ships persist long after they have vanished from the seas.

But in all these cases there was finality. The ship was lost, the crew missing or dead. What are we to say of a ship discovered at sea in perfect order with nobody on board, whose crew was never heard of again, though nearly sixty years have passed? And how are we to explain the almost incredible mendacities and embroideries which have accumulated during half a century about the story of this derelict? The ordinary hypotheses of human behavior seem hardly adequate to account for the monstrous growth of this legend which has clustered about the most celebrated derelict in history, the Marie Celeste.

In the beginning the discovery of this ship sailing along without a crew, her sails set, her bilges dry, her cargo intact and without a single sign of violence to account for her abandonment, was mysterious enough. And there were accessory coincidences which gave rise to strange conjectures. But the singular feature of the Marie Celeste was the sinister effect of her story upon the imaginations of all who have volunteered to explain what happened to her.

To recite the bare facts: The Marie Celeste on November 1, 1872, left New York loaded with 1,700 drums of alcohol, consigned to Genoa. The master was Benjamin Briggs, and he had with him his wife, daughter and a crew of seven. The statement that she had the unlucky thirteen is fiction.

On December 5, she was found off the coast of Portugual by the British brig Dei Gratia, Capt. Morehouse, sailing along without a soul on board. Capt. Morehouse took her into Gibraltar and reported the salving of a derelict in the usual way.

Mr. Solly Flood, Her Majesty's attorney general for Gibraltar, instituted every possible examination of the Marie Celeste. But beyond some stains on a cutlass in the cabin, which afterward were tested and found to be rust and not blood, and some trivial damage to the rail of the bows, which never has been adequately explained, there was nothing on which to erect a hypothesis of mutiny, murder or theft. The master's money and watch were found where he would leave them; the clothes of Mrs. Briggs and a rosewood melodeon were all in perfect order. The log was written up until ten days previous to the finding of the ship. And the Marie Celeste, incredible as it may seem, apparently had sailed 750 miles, practically on her course, with nobody on board!

Capt. Winchester, of New York, the principal owner of the Marie Celeste, after a special visit to Gibraltar to attend the inquiry, concluded that Capt. Briggs had prematurely abandoned the vessel owing to some slight explosion of gas from the alcohol leaking into the hold, and, failing to regain her when the panic was over, had been driven in the yawl on the volcanic shores of Santa Maria, in the Azores Islands, and the entire ship's company drowned.

Now every factual statement in the above account of the Marie Celeste may be accepted today as demonstrable truth. The hypothesis put forward, that the master and crew abandoned her prematurely and then lost their lives, was that favored by Capt. Winchester, and it has the virtue of accounting for every significant fact of the catastrophe. And yet, from 1872 until the present time, a long series of preposterous fabrications have been published and believed and contradicted, only to be discovered thriving lustily in some other part of the world. It appears as though editors and writers in the magazines of the past have made a special case of the Marie Celeste and have been willing to be fooled. They were willing to believe the wildest stories about her with a minimum of verification. The characters of the men on board and the integrity of the British and American authorities, the feelings of the surviving relatives and the very laws of probability have been powerless to withstand the demand for fresh and sensational stories about the Marie Celeste. And even today men of long seafaring experience are everywhere to be found who regard the fate of her crew as an insoluble mystery, a sacred classic among sea disasters.

We are confronted here not so much with a sea mystery as a complex problem in human psychology. We have first the fatal facility with which ancient shellbacks announce their participation in voyages and disasters of whose details they have no real knowledge, and on the other hand we have the strange necessity of the human spirit to believe a lie sooner than the truth.

Before going on to these tales it is necessary to allude to the part Sir Arthur Conan Doyle bears in the propagation of this great legend which, like a veritable Sargasso Sea, has becalmed the fate of the Marie Celeste. Sir Arthur used the facts of the case to write a story, published anonymously and called "J. Habakuk Jephson's Statement." This Jephson was supposed to be one of the three passengers on the ship, and another was a quadroon, Goring, who murdered the captain and officers and eventualy sailed the ship to Africa, where a tribe of blacks took Jephson ashore after killing the remainder of the crew. Jephson early in life had been nursed by an old black "mammy," who had given him a piece of stone carved in the shape of a human ear. This ear belonged to the idol of the tribe and accounted for Mr. Jephson's miraculous preservation.

CONAN DOYLE'S yarn seemed to bewitch all who came within its range. The fact proves that people have a weakness for romance and a dislike of rational solutions. The Marie Celeste became the pet sea mystery of two generations. So strong was the predilection for absurd explanations that when a magazine invited three novelists to have a try these gentlemen never dreamed of getting the officials facts of the salvage. Arthur Morrison, an expert writer of mysteries, invented a madman who murdered the crew with poison and ax and then jumped overboard himself. Horace A. Vachell favored a submarine volcano. Barry Pain, a humorist, voted for a pirate vessel which had had her crew thinned by fever and who attacked and impressed the crew of the Marie Celeste. A Russian, Capt. Lukhamanoff, professed to have heard a story from a Greek sailor named Demetrius Specioti, who was aboard the Marie Celeste under an assumed name and who told Capt. Lukhamanoff under oath of secrecy that pirates had carried off the crew and that the pirate vessel had been run down by a steamer.

William McFee.

All these solutions have been put forth, not as fiction but as possible explanations. Yet Capt. Winchester, the owner, in 1872, 57 years ago, offered a perfectly satisfactory hypothesis, bearing in mind the character of the master, the presence of his wife and child on board and the alarming behavior of a cargo of alcohol in an unventilated ship.

But these tales fade into nothingness before the "confession" of one John Pemberton which has been recently revived in a new book.

When the Marie Celeste sailed, the captain's wife had with her a piano, according to Pemberton, who goes on to say that the mate "stowed the music so she'd feel the weather," that is, lashed the piano fore and aft. And then, when a lazy sailor named Sanson was caught napping at the wheel the brig went over on her beam ends, the lashings carried away, and Mrs. Briggs, who was playing "Nearer, My God, to Thee," was crushed against the bulkhead and died the next morning. This tragedy sent Capt. Briggs off his head. He ordered Sanson to be flung into the sea, and when the crew refused he compromised with the piano. During the night he himself lowered it overboard. The remainder of the crew fled ashore.

Thus, the psychology of ancient mariners is a very wonderful and complex phenomenon. They have been through all human trials and are waiting to put out on the last great voyage when they will have to leave all lies behind. Who can doubt that sometimes they derive a malicious delight in the reconstruction of the past as they would have had it, making themselves the heroes of the play and fooling the eager, insatiable hunger of a younger generation for mystery and romance?

Nobody's Business

By WESTBROOK PEGLER

FOR all the complaining against laws that restrict the innocent pleasures and amiable vices of the sporty element in the United States, a canvass of the facts would show that there has been a general relenting since the war and that the horses run, the prize fighters fight or purport to do so and the crap dice bounce off the baseboard in many places where formerly such works were held to be out of order.

There is now more territory open to such pastimes than there has been at any other time in the last 25 years. The new territory was won back from the empire of reform while the armies massed about the citadel of prohibition to the neglect of the minor fronts.

Horse racing now is conducted either by legal sanction or local sanction or local toleration, sometimes under court injunction setting aside the laws, in New York, Saratoga, Baltimore, Louisville, Lexington, Latonia, New Orleans, Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Miami, Jacksonville, East St. Louis, Butte and Reno. Barring unexpected writs there will be a horse meeting in Tulsa, the first ever held in Oklahoma.

It seems strange that Texas, which was the wildest American frontier within the memory of living men, should have come to regard horse running as an immoral device, but the pioneers were zealous in loose conduct, and their descendants took up morality with the same enthusiasm. Consequently, even poker, the national game of the Lone Star republic, is a statutory sin there now.

At the end of the war, there was little territory in the United States in which racing was acknowledged by law. The strong points were Maryland, Kentucky and New York, and the game prospered in New Orleans, although its legal status with regard to gambling was not secure. In most of the development since then, the promoters have taken their chances. They noted a new sporty tendency of the town bloods in various cities and usually found the small merchants and innkeepers disposed to be helpful. Even in Columbus, Ohio, the capital of the Anti-Saloon League, a suburban stubble field was fenced in and a band of promoters ran a season of races, sleeping with their clothes on, of course, and ready to go down the fire escapes or make bail, if any one roused the law.

Cleveland has had three tracks. One was abandoned, but two have continued to operate, strictly outside the law, but with the connivance of the constables.

Florida has four tracks. The law forbids betting, but at the height of the boom Hialeah, at Miami, and Tampa Downs, on the west coast, carried on under a synthetic pari mutuel plan while the courts snoozed over the legal distinction between tweedledum and tweedle-dee. When the extravagant spending waned, the courts discovered that the law forbade synthetic mutuels, too, so both tracks closed.

In the meantime, a large track was built at Pompano, on the Miami side of the State. This one has been a complete disaster to date, having been completed about the time the boomers pulled out and the court ruled against the betting. It still stands, an expensive monument to optimism. The fourth one is Keeney Park, between Jacksonville and St. Augustine, which opened last spring. At Miami last winter oral bookmakers were on the premises to gratify the speculative enthusiasm of the customers, and the same system was used at Keeney Park, implying an obvious arrangement between the promoters and the local officers. It was not a convenient way of betting, but Miami had to have horse races, and gambling is essential to the improvement of the breed.

The city depends entirely on the pleasure traffic for its living, and the local delegation has bargained and pleaded with a backwoods majority in the legislature for a law to sanction mutuels, turned down again at the last session. Miami will entertain the oralists again next winter. Jacksonville, a busy seaport with comparatively little tourist business, is not dependent on Keeney Park, and St. Augustine, a sedate resort, is not especially interested in the track, either.

THE FOOLISH VIRGIN

THE STORY THUS FAR.

Pamela Raleigh, lovely daughter of a fine old California family, and the most popular girl in Carterbridge, faces poverty light-heartedly. Her mother is impractical and content to live on credit while she talks about the past glories of the family.

At the annual rodeo Pam meets Chester Hilliard, promising young man, who has come to town to work in his uncle's bank. They fall in love immediately. One night they go for a drive in the mountains and the car runs out of gas. Stranded, with no way of getting back, they spend the night in an old shack. Mrs. Broome, self-righteous and narrow-minded mother of Pam's friend, Maisie, finds out about it and places Pam in disgrace. Chester, whose part in the incident seems to be forgotten by the town, swears his loyalty to Pam, but she sees that his interest is dying. Pride will not let her show her love or ask for sympathy.

Meanwhile the financial situation in the Raleigh family grows acute, and they are forced to move from the old family house into a cheap apartment. Pam gets a job at the Molino Ranch as a sort of housekeeper. Gregory Chard, owner of the ranch, is a rough young fellow, half-Spanish and half-English. His grandmother and cousin, Col. Charteris, come to visit him, and Pam's job is to make things comfortable for them. Col. Charteris, who was made a cripple in the war, tells Pam one day about his dead wife. Old Mrs. Chard takes a liking to Pam and becomes interested in her. Pam, under the influence of the peaceful ranch life, regains her good spirits, but can not forget her love for Chester Hilliard. Mrs. Chard learns of Pam's ostracism in Carterbridge and determines to give a party at Molino Ranch. Pam, wrapped up in her work, does not realize that Gregory Chard has fallen in love with her.

CHAPTER XXIX.

GREGORY walked along beside Pamela, his arms, as her arms were, filled with the young branches, the warm sunshine pouring down through a roof of leaves overhead, the air sweet and perfumed, with not a breath stirring, and the sea, at the little canon's end, where the woods opened out into marshy strips and pebbly shale, singing its eternal surging song of loneliness, and change, and far ports, and vast and endless silences.

"Isn't it pretty?" the girl asked, as they emerged from the trees, and mounted to the cliffs, and could see the long line of ranch buildings and the trees that towered above the hacienda lying before them. The pink-tiled roof of the house was gracious in warm lead shadows; the windmills, the cattle, and hay barns, and the straggling line of bunkhouses and cabins were all dappled with light and shadow, all silent and sleepy in a dreaming noontide. Gregory's prize Hereford breathed a little whine of protest through his wet muzzle, pawing the ground with one dangerous, sharp hoof; calves blatted in pens, immediately forgetting their troubles to spring about their small prisons ecstatically, infected, as all the world was infected, with the wine and glory of the day.

"You like Molino, don't you?" Gregory asked, his heart beginning to beat fast. He had not meant to say it.

Pamela looked up at the broad, squarely built form and the olive face, with its Latin flash of white, white teeth and smiled.

"Gregory, who wouldn't?"

"But I mean—more than you did when you came down?"

"Oh, when I first came here? Well, I was sunk, then," admitted Pamela, frankly. "I was heartbroken—everything was going wrong—I wouldn't have wanted to go to heaven itself, then!"

"Money troubles, huh? And living at that boarding house?"

"Oh, yes; and other things. People," said Pamela.

She laughed up at him, a laugh of sheer excitement. Her thoughts were far away from Gregory, striding along beside her in his faded khaki and high-laced boots and disreputable sombrero. She told herself that this afternoon she would see Chester—Jessy Stokes had been invited to Mrs. Chard's tea, as a matter of course, and Pamela had written Chester that he was invited too, and he must bring her down. Chester! And he would see her, Pamela, in her batiste dress; it was not a new dress, but always fine and delicate and transparent over the little white slip. He would see Pamela in the exquisite setting of the patio, with the green parrot and the magnificent old lady and the romantically invalided English officer to lend additional color. Yes, and Greg, too, for Gregory was undeniably handsome and effective; and it might surprise Mr. Chester Hilliard to see how brotherly and affectionate! Gregory beside her, helping her entertain the very cream of Carterbridge's society.

Thinking these things, she laughed up at Gregory excitedly over the furry jade-white leaves of oak, and Gregory lost his head completely, and said thickly, excitedly, in his turn:

"I don't suppose—I guess you know what I mean—I don't suppose you'd stay here?"

Instantly she sobered, and her face grew warm. She had thought of this but not today. Laughing as awkwardly as he did, she answered uncomfortably:

"I hoped—I hoped you wouldn't say that, Greg."

"I never will again!" he promised, quickly, fervently, chilled and ashamed. "I sort of knew you would not," he added, aware that he had taken her at a disadvantage and anxious to spare her. "It—it wouldn't be much of a life for you!"

"What?" she asked, regaining her poise. "To be mistress of the hacienda? It'd be wonderful; don't be foolish, Greg. It's the most beautiful place in the world, and you're—" her nod indicated the other occupants of the hacienda, as well as himself—you're the kindest people! But—but you see I'm not free, Greg. You see I'm——" She laughed, confidential, rosy, all the small, endearing sister. "You see, I'm in love!" she confessed.

He cleared his throat; his face was a deep red.

"I see. With—with some feller in Carterbridge?" He was talking to help get control of himself.

"With—" she hesitated, but it was delicious to say it; she had to go on—"with Chester Hilliard," she said.

There was a silence.

"I know who you mean—he's in the bank with old Bob," Gregory said then, slowly. "Slim, dark feller, with smooth hair."

It brought the vision of Chester before her, and her voice sang.

"That's he."

"And it's an engagement, is it?" the man asked, still with some little difficulty in his speech.

The enormity of it scared her a little, and she ran to cover.

"Oh, not quite that. Well—almost, I guess. That is—it's an understanding."

It made her happy, saying it. Everything seemed to be so right and simple and natural on this singing early summer morning.

"Why hasn't he—" Gregory began, almost truculently. He changed the form of his question, his voice softer. "Why haven't you asked him down here?"

"I should have, I suppose." It did sound an obvious oversight. Chester wouldn't come without an invitation—that was it. "But you see the roads have been out of order, after the rains—and then it was wet, you know, for ten solid days, and then he was away—he went away twice. To San Francisco, for one thing. And then everything had been so awful—I've told you of the smash, our old house being sold, and no money, you know, and—I don't know, everything came at once! And this was my first job. I suppose, perhaps, Chester didn't know how it would go, or whether he ought to come down here."

"I see," Gregory said, again speaking slowly, his eyes upon her flushed and eager face.

"But I've had letters from him every week, and of course he'll be here this afternoon," Pamela said, her gray eyes starry.

"And how soon—were you going to get married?" His own heartbreak, his own agony meant nothing to her, and he could see it. The experiment at the rancho had been merely a bridge across a time of waiting; she felt that the probational weeks were almost over now, summer was upon them, Chester was coming down to the rancho, M'ma was comfortable, debts were being paid—anything might happen. Happiness sang in her soul again, and Gregory knew that she was scarcely conscious of his presence, that he might have been anybody or nobody for all that she knew or cared.

His question scared her a little, and she caught her breath childishly and laughed.

"Oh, we haven't talked at all of marriage! You see, Chester only came out here a year ago."

She had to hesitate, for a second of exquisite recollection. It was twilight, summer twilight, in the tea room of the Arms again, and Pamela Raleigh, the most popular girl in town, was dancing her first dance with Jessy Hilliard's handsome cousin, a college graduate from the East.

"He only came out here a year ago," she went on, "and for a while old Mr. Hilliard kept him simply dangling, not knowing whether he would take him into the bank or not. And then—you see—they all got down on me—" Pamela said, stumbling, her innocent eyes upon Gregory's face.

"You told me. And this Hilliard was the fellow whose gas gave out?"

It was nice of him to condense the whole wretched incident to that. Pamela felt a little rush of sisterly affection for Gregory.

"He was the man. And then, you see, I was simply——" she searched for a word, had to revert to her former phrase. "I was simply sunk," she confessed, laughing. "It appeared that M'ma had been letting her affairs run into the ground, we'd been borrowing and charging and scrambling along in a manner that was—well, nothing more nor less than unscrupulous," she said. "Chester went over our affairs with me. . . ."

Another arresting vision of the fine hands and the smooth dark head beside her own in the dilapidated and collapsing kitchen of the old house. Pamela had to give it a few seconds, before she went on:

"My brother Carter wasn't working, we owed nearly two thousand dollars, Chester's position wasn't settled—it was all—awful!" Pamela said, her eyes round and childish as they appealed to his for sympathy.

"And the rancho was—any port in a storm?" he said, taking a queer satisfaction in turning the knife.

"I was just despairing. I cried myself to sleep the first three nights here; I've never done that before in my life." And then with a sudden recollection of her manners, she laughed apologetically. "You know what I mean, Gregory?"

So sisterly, so dear, so utterly desirable, with her bared head, and her arms full of leaves.

"Sure, I know what you mean!" he answered, with a gruff little laugh. And then, arresting her in the very arch of the patio doorway. "Pamela, if things are still unsettled—I mean if you and Hilliard have to wait a while longer—for any reason—don't be afraid I'll ever—bother you again."

"Gregory—I'm only so sorry—" she stammered, stricken and ashamed.

"Oh, that's all right!" he said.

"And if it weren't——" her happy color rushed up again—"if it weren't for Chester," she explained, "I can't think of any life—any home—and you're so good and kind, too, Greg—and it'd be more—well more than I deserved, to be down here! But—you see—I can't!" She smiled up at him, and he smiled back, and they went into the patio with their leaves.

The afternoon rushed upon them; it was time to help Mrs. Chard into plum-colored silk and lace; it was time for Pamela to run upstairs for a last ruffle of her tawny hair; it was time to watch for first-comers.

Then, suddenly, they were all about her; Maisie, laughing and loving as ever, Carol, and Sam; the voices and the presences for which she had hungered for two endless months—hungered indeed for far longer than that.

For the clock seemed to have been turned back a whole year, and she was old Pamela again, the queen of them all. There were kisses and confidences and all the happy gossip that had once been her very breath.

"Pam—what do you think of Maisie here?"

"Pam, my dear—is it announced?"

"Rather! And we're giving her showers! And Mrs. Broome is going to give her a regular dance when it's cooler."

"And listen, Pam——" This was Maisie, with her arm about Pamela, in their old happy fashion. "Listen, you've got to come in and stay with me that night!"

"You knew Harry Beaver'd broken his collar bone?"

"You knew about the junior auxiliary?"

"Heavenly sandwiches—you made these, Pam. Nobody ever made them like yours!"

"And isn't old Mrs. Chard a darling?"

"And isn't Gregory nice—in his own home? He seems so much thinner, somehow—or older. Or maybe it's younger."

The sun shone down, and the high branches above the patio waved softly, and more black cars, like laboring beetles, crossed the green fields below the hacienda, and more beautiful frocks and bright hats, like inverted moving flowers, came through the adobe arches, and there was more laughter and more identifications, that were like royal recognitions, by the old lady. The Broomes and the Catherwoods and the Stockeses and the Beavers—after 50 years!

"It was long before you were born, my dear—I left there in '78," Mrs. Chard would say, her keen old eyes reading the younger faces. Everybody made a charming little excitement over meeting her; there was a flattering stir all afternoon long about her chair. Fancy—an old, old resident, a real pioneer of Carterbridge coming back, after half a century! Did she know that old Mr. Hilliard and Judge Beaver's father—who was nearly 90—and several of the other real pioneers were coming out to see her? And dear old Col. Troutt, who was in the Odd Fellows Home, had said that if she'd fix the day he'd be driven over for an hour of reminiscence with young Mrs. Charteris—for that was what her name was when he knew her!

Chester Hilliard had dutifully remained at the office and would drive out with his uncle at about 5, it was explained. But Jessy was here, most cordial to Pamela—the one to suggest, indeed, that Pamela mustn't forget the Cinderellas next winter, even if she only came in to one dance!—and looking charming in a dress that hardly showed it at all. And Sue Rose looked charming, looked almost pretty, and, as usual, had something really important to say to Pamela; and must take Pamela off into the blue shadow of the patio, a hand on Pamela's shoulder, as she said:

"Pam, mother told me to get this over to you—and I know she talked about it to Mrs. Broome—you know they have confabs about everything. She said to assure you that that—you know, that thing that happened to you and Chester Hilliard last summer had nothing—nothing to do with your membership in the Cinderellas being suspended—do you see?"

Pamela's face had flushed, but she was smiling; she was sympathetic. This ugly little bit of ground must be got over—it must be endured. This explanation must be made, of course, and then it would be all forgotten, and the future would be all roses, and the past the past.

"Mother said that it was because she liked you so much—and we all did!" Sue Rose rushed on, "and because, through Jack Stokes at the bank, you know, and Judge Beaver and everything, she and Mrs. Broome knew exactly how bad your mother's affairs were. And then, besides—we all had been going it pretty fast, you know?" Sue Rose ended, on a questioning note, with a little compunctious laugh, "and they had just determined to stop it. But—but you will be back, sometimes, in Carterbridge, this coming winter, won't you, Pam?" Sue Rose pleaded, forgetting, in the importance of "mother's" message that Pamela had been waiting, neglected and heartsick, and only a square or two away, all through last winter's dreary months, for just these words.

She laughted, confidential. "You see, I'm in love."

CHAPTER XXX.

Pamela, however, was in heaven today and she could afford to forget, too. Her voice broke on a little excited laugh, as she said generously:

"Oh, I know I will, I may have to, in fact."

"You mean if old Mrs. Chard goes back to England?"

"Yes. Or—oh, anything!" Marriage, for instance; a simple little morning wedding, on an autumn day, in—well, it would have to be the Hilliard house, probably, M'ma in dark blue silk...."

"And you're coming in for Maisie's party?"

"Maisie asked me to."

"Oh, Pam, it'll be such fun to have you with us all again!" And Sue Rose gave one of her chummy, affectionate little wriggles to which it was very hard to respond, somehow, even though it meant only affection and desire to be demonstrative.

"You know, or I don't know if you do, that I always liked Carter enormously," said Sue Rose, laughing.

"And he always liked you," Pamela said, in duty bound.

Six o'clock; she could hear the angelus ringing faithfully down in the little crossroads settlement of Madrona Vista; as it had rung since the days of the padres—since Rancho del Molino Solitario had been built. The sound of it came sweet across the fields and the fresh trees to the hacienda, where guests walked on the roof and eucalyptus tassels of cream and pink fringe moved gently in a late afternoon breeze. And all Carterbridge was having tea with old lady Chard.

Everything was going well so far; everything was wonderful so far. Anita brought the cake, and Mary passed the sandwiches, and there was a sweetness, a clear translucency about the dying day in the old garden that seemed to make the social occasion strangely fitting; the crumpled napkins, the voices, the moving, brightly clad forms, the pleasant laughter.

A great snowball bush, a veritable fountain of round blooms, tumbled to the grass beside the old lady's chair; climbing salmon roses on the roof were transparent in straight lances of sinking light; bees whizzed by like low-flying projectiles between the bells of the lilies. The air was sweet with lilac, and trampled, wilting grass, and delicate tea, and cigarettes. Pamela, seeing that she was not particularly needed anywhere, took a cushion at Mrs. Chard's feet. Dr. Broome and Mrs. Broome, Mrs. Billings, Jessy Stokes, and Mrs. Catherwood were all there, talking and drinking tea; about Col. Charteris' long chair, a dozen feet away, there was a younger group. Pamela discovered that among the elders a rather curious conversation was going on.

She reached for a sandwich, and looked at Anita, and listened idly. The old lady, behind her and above her, put down a friendly, stout old hand, and patted her cheek. It was some seconds before Pamela appreciated that there was a certain constraint in the familiar circle.

Mrs. Broome looked flushed, Jessy Hilliard Stokes was rather pale. There was an uneasy light in Mrs. Catherwood's eyes.

"Whatever happened to that old lawsuit of Jim Hilliard's, Dr. Broome?" asked Mrs. Chard. "You remember—about the property down there toward San Jacinto?"

"The Paulsons—they were mixed into that some way," mused the old lady. Pamela, looking about the circle merely for sympathetic, indulgent interest in an old lady's wandering, was amazed to see Mrs. Broome soften nervously. She remembered suddenly that Paulson had been Mrs. Broome's family name. "Well, you remember the scandal at the Gold West House, Doctor?" resumed Mrs. Chard briskly. "You remember the girl—somebody—who was it?—who married the colored man there? He was the only colored man in town for a while, and old Col. Carter—the child's grandfather—was simply an idol. He was never so happy as when he could do something for the colonel—drive his bays, or burn rubbish or wait on table. He was only half-black, a handsome, big fellow. And he—unless my memory fails me—married——"

Pamela's cheerfully wandering gaze was arrested at Mrs. Catherwood's face. It was never a really pretty face, any more than Sue Rose's, for their nose flanges were a little wide, their cheek bones a little high, and although both mother and daughter had curly, dark-brown hair and dark brown eyes, somehow the effect that Pamela had never seen her looks ghastly as she looked now. The whites of her eyes showed oddly, and her face had an ugly, strange pallor; she was breathing hard, and the girl could see tiny beads of moisture on her upper lip.

"We don't have things like that people like that, nowadays," Mrs. Chard, without finishing her last sentence, said innocently. "I've got it all in my notes—I've got the whole file of the Pioneer. That was the little newspaper poor Bob Charteris amused himself with during the last years of his life. He ran it for about two years, and afterward it went on for about another year. I don't know that even the public library would have a file of that little paper—the Star was started in '[illegible] and after that the other never had a chance. It was hand printed; we had a little press—I daresay the copies I've got are the only ones in existence!"

Dr. Broome cleared his throat.

"I never heard of it," he said. "We had a big fire here in '89 that destroyed almost all our records—the little library we had then was wiped out. But it would seem—no more, than you, delicious!—it would seem just as well sometimes not to disturb all the old memories," he suggested mildly. "Did you—did you bring that little old newspaper out with you?"

Pamela, only partly in the dark now, wondered if she saw, or only imagined that she saw, Mrs. Broome's eyes go hungrily at this point to the upper windows of the hacienda, as if she thought of these documents securely hidden away in some old trunk. It was turning into a strange tea party; somehow, none of these dignified and middle-aged persons was expressing in manner or words the simple pleasure of having a chat with an old, old lady who had known most of their fathers and grandfathers before them.

"How long are you to be here in Carterbridge, Mrs. Chard?" Mrs. Catherwood asked pleasantly, after a few minutes. And again it seemed to Pamela that they all waited for the reply.

"I wasn't going to stay as long as this," the old lady responded. "But my grandson—and this child here!—have made us so comfortable, and Col. Charteris is so much better—better than he's been in ten years—that I'd stay some time, if I could be sure that this girl"—again her hand touched Pamela's cheek gently—"this girl would occasionally have a good time with her old friends, as a girl ought to have!" she said.

Pamela did not quite know why—it was no extraordinary wish for an old lady, who could be kindly enough when she chose, to express—but at the words and touch tears suddenly stood in her eyes, and the lovely panorama of the patio blurred into blots and streaks of green and gold light. It was as if a champion—the father she could barely remember, or what her mother might have been—stood suddenly between her and the rough wind of life that had blown so harshly across her for almost a long year. She gulped and smiled and tightened her own fingers about Mrs. Chard's hand.

"Maisie is hoping to have her overnight, very soon," said Mrs. Broome promptly, cordially.

"Yes, you must let us see more of you, Pamela, now that things here have settled down so nicely," Mrs. Catherwood said.

They were all so kind! They were all so friendly again. It was like the old days, when she had stayed overnight with Sue Rose and Maisie and Carol quite as simply as in her own home. Pamela's face glowed with pleasure, and she told herself that she had misjudged them all, her sensitiveness and morbidness had built this wall between her and all her old associations.

"Pamela is going to be my amanuensis," said Mrs. Chard. "I shall dictate to her—a little at a time—with quotations from the Pioneer."

"Pamela will have to deal gently with all of her old friends," said Dr. Broome, in a dead silence.

"A great many things go on in a young community that naturally could not possibly go on in after years," Mrs. Catherwood added, in a challenging tone.

Pamela heard neither. One more car had come chugging out across the flat road that wound between the meadows of the Molino rancho, and its occupants were coming into the garden. An old man, stately and impressive—Robert Hilliard of the Carterbridge Bank—and a young man, slim and dark, his figure faultless in striped trousers and dark blue coat, his dark eyes seeking the corners of the patio eagerly, threading the groups, oblivious of the smiles that greeted him. Chester!

The color left Pamela's face, and as she walked toward him she was very pale and looked taller and even slenderer than usual—with a strange light in her gray eyes. She gave her right hand to his uncle, but at the same time her left went to Chester, and he gripped it, and when the old man went on to Mrs. Chard's chair Pamela's fingers did not loosen their hold.

"Well, hello, Pamela!"

"Hello, Chester."

He nodded, smiled here and there in response to casual greetings. Then they escaped the moving groups somehow, and were beside the old fountain, sheltered from the rest of the patio by the great flowery mound of a neglected rose tree.

Pamela, half sitting, leaned against the stone rim of the fountain; their hands were linked, at arm's length, and they stood laughing at each other.

"Well, Pamela! And lovelier than ever!"

"But, Chester — Chester—it's so good to see you again!"

"You've missed me, then?"

She wouldn't answer this. She said:

"I hope I wasn't rude—carrying you off this way. But I had to see you!"

He smiled down at her, and his smile was as wonderful as the memory of it had been, and his voice as haunting.

"I don't think you were rude. But as I wasn't in the least conscious of any one else, they may have all been speechless with wrath, for all I saw!"

There it was again—the smooth, polished half-laughing and wholly enchanting manner! She had so hungered for it.

"You look simply radiant, dear."

"Ah, well, why not—now?"

And they both laughed again, excitedly and youthfully.

"But, Pam, what a beautiful place, and what a pretty party!"

"Isn't it? Molino's the most beautiful place in the world, I think. You should see it in the early morning."

"Do you mean that you're an early riser at last?"

Delicious—Delicious to be talking to Chester again. She could hardly think of what she said.

"I was. When I first came here, you know, it was wet and cold and uncomfortable, and there was—well, just everything to do! You never saw such a jumble of new things, and old things, and crates to unpack, and trunks; and Col. Charteris—he's Gregory's cousin——"

"You wrote me. Is he nice?"

"He's just—adorable!"

"I see. And in love with Pam?"

"Oh, no; nothing like that!" She laughed exultingly. "He's nearly 40, you know—twice as old as I am—and he idolized his wife—and, besides, he's ill. But, Chester, would you be just a little jealous if I liked him?"

"Oh, more than that," the man said, seriously. He smiles a little constrainedly. "You and I weathered some pretty bad times last winter, didn't we? And the friendship we formed then is one of the most precious things in my life."

Pamela looked at him, surprised and uneasy. There was a change in his manner; his gayety, his nonsense, his air of well-being and of satisfaction with the world seemed suddenly to have vanished; he was grave, affectionate, exquisitely polite, but—but somehow he wasn't Chester!

Sue Rose blurted out the name. It seemed to scream itself through the air.

CHAPTER XXXI.

"Chester, everything's all right?" she asked in alarm.

"What could possibly not be all right, today, here?" he countered, smiling. And then suddenly, deliberately, "But tell me about yourself. Do you know that I haven't seen you for eight weeks? What have you been doing and how are you? It's so lovely to find you in a place like this, looking so well. It hasn't been too horrible, has it?"

"Oh, no. Not after the first. But lonely!"

"Chard isn't exactly what you'd call thrilling, eh?"

"Gregory?" Oh, yes, he's really fine!" she defended him quickly. And he's—he's the kindest person—and handsome, too, when he rides round with his cowboys, don't you think?—Spanishy looking. And he's funny, too; you've no idea how he makes us laugh sometimes. That isn't stupidity, Chester, that queer look, when he half shuts his eyes—it's partly shyness and partly pride. He can be bold enough when he wants to be! But——"

Chester laughed as she paused, and Pamela, red-cheeked, very earnest, suddenly broke and laughed, too.

"But——?" the man teased her.

"But—well, he's not you, Chester!" she said, simply.

"Well, I'm glad he's so nice," Chester said, with unexpected generosity. "he has all kinds, hasn't he?"

"Oh, yes, he's enormously rich," Pamela answered indifferently, rightly interpreting the rather cryptic phrase as referring to money.

Chester gave her an odd look.

"If I hadn't come along just when I did, Pam, you'd have fallen for him and been fixed for life!"

She answered with a look of reproach.

"I am fixed for life!"

"I'm fixed for—I don't know what!" Chester said vexedly, taking advantage of the world to rush into confidences. "I'm in the deuce of a lot of trouble!"

"Oh, Chester, how?" Her tone was stricken, yet happy in being his confidante.

"Oh, I've just got mixed up in some funny business!"

"With the bank?"

"No. Yes, partly. I'll get out of it all right," said Chester. "And I made up my mind I wouldn't tell you about it—and here I go blabbing it the first thing!"

"Well of course. Much wiser to tell me. You don't know—I might help you out?"

"No—it's nothing really. It's just—well, my own fault entirely. I can thank myself! But it just—it makes me mad to think I'm such a fool!" Chester said youthfully.

"Well, but tell me, anyway!"

"Nothing to tell. It was just that Jack Stokes and my uncle asked me to help them with a client—in—in San Francisco—managing an estate——"

"You've been playing the races!" Her eyes were dancing; she could not be serious today.

"Lord, if it was as simple as that!"

"Well, go on, tell me! You know you'll tell me sooner or later!"

He deliberately evaded the subject.

"Tell me what you do with yourself all day."

"Oh—everything. You get interested, you know, in the cattle and the Mexicans. And Col. Charteris is a wonderful person—always getting books by the crate. He tells me what to read; we read a lot. And then we talk—and play games—card games. Lately, it hasn't been so bad. At first I felt horribly! No, but go on now, Chester," the girl coaxed, the fragrance and sweetness of her very close to him. "Tell me. What's worrying you?"

"Well, it's this woman!" he burst out, vexed, ashamed, penitential, half whimsical.

"Woman?" Her eyes were amazed.

"The woman whose estate I'm running, I tell you!"

"Oh——?" Enlightenment and mirth struggled together in Pamela's eyes. "I see," she said slowly, reading his face. "She's fallen in love with you?"

Chester was scarlet with annoyance and a sort of unwilling pride.

"Something like that."

"Oh, Chester—how awful!" But there was nothing but laughter in her voice. "Is she terrible? What is she—a widow? An old maid?"

"No, she's very nice. She's not married. My uncle has been running her affairs for years, and he handed it over to me, and I consulted Jack at the bank, and—of course, I had to see her——"

"Well, of course! And she really has a case?" Pamela said musingly. Presently the brightness faded from her face. "I'm not sure I like avaricious spinsters falling in love with you, Chester," she said slowly.

"It's the deuce of a mix-up," the man admitted gloomily.

"Of course—hurt her feelings and you lose the case," Pamela reflected aloud. "That wouldn't do. Couldn't you get Jack? He's married, after all." She paused. "She doesn't think you're going to ask her to marry you, Chester?" she demanded flatly.

"I don't know what she thinks!" he answered bitterly. And then, with a little effort, "Yes, I suppose she does. I don't suppose she sees any reason why I shouldn't."

Pamela's gayety suffered a sudden check. Across her face went the expressions that spoke as clearly as words could have done: he has let her think he admires her; he has made love to her; he h-- been at least as much to blame as she!

To hold a client—well, men did queer things in the name of business. Perhaps this unmarried woman was lonely; it was a foregone conclusion, her attraction to the handsome and magnetic man of business.

"Well, I fell in love with you when you were running my business, Chester," the girl admitted, with a little rueful laugh. "You're too fascinating, that's all!"

"You can josh about it!" he said. "But I've kind of let myself into it—and now I don't know what to do!"

"That was what took you to San Francisco!" Pamela pieced it together.

"What was?" he roused himself from despondent musing to ask.

"Why, to confer with your new lady-love!"

"Oh, yes. Oh, yes. Darn it!" he said.

"Is she terribly rich, Chester?"

"Yes—she has a pot of money."

Pamela studied him a minute, all love and sympathy and tenderness in her beautiful eyes. From the other side of the garden they could hear the babble of voices and laughter—Sam's shout of mirth, Maisie's voice suddenly raised. But here, beside the dry old fountain, close to the peaceful arcades of the hacienda that were filling with sunset light now, there was peace.

"Why, my dear, Pamela said, presently, in her motherly voice, "you musn't let this worry you! There's only one thing to do. Tell her the truth honestly—tell her that you had a girl long before you went up to San Francisco. Tell her, if you like ,that you like her—you do like her—but that you aren't free."

His face did not brighten. One of his hands played with the delicate linen of her blouse, folding and refolding the transparent batiste with nervous fingers, his eyes following his hand.

"I refuse to set you free!" Pamela said cheerfully. "Tell her that."

"You'd be an awful fool—— This isn't what I mean to say today, but I think it, and I might as well say it!" Chester said, in a low, troubled tone, without raising his eyes. "You'd be an awful fool to wait for me!"

Pamela stared at him, puzzled and uneasy.

"Wait for you! But, Chester——" she tried to speak as if he had been joking—"but, Chester, what else should I do?"

He was silent a minute, his fingers still pleating the white gown.

"Marry Chard, I suppose!" he said then, with an uncomfortable laugh.

Pamela was hurt. She stepped back, turning toward the group at the other end of the patio.

"Come on; we must go back, Chester. People are going, and I ought to be there!"

He followed her a few steps quickly, caught at her unwilling hands, turned her about in the shelter of the wild overgrown rose bush.

"Pamela, I'm sorry!" Just believe that I—I'm miserable about it! Give me another month—four weeks—and I'll come down here and tell you that the whole thing is a dream. My darling——"

One arm was tight across her shoulders, her head was tipped backward until a sharp pain ran through her throat, Chester's lips were on hers, pressing down, drinking deep of the purity and sweetness of her own.

"You glorious—you glorious—you beautiful thing—the most beautiful God ever made!" he muttered. And against her own breast she could feel his heart beating hard and fast.

"Pamela—I'm sorry," a voice said behind her. She turned about, dizzied and bewildered, coming down from heaven with blinded senses, putting her hand instinctively to her tumbled hair, panting, laughing, trying to keep her feet steady on the ground. The patio, and the arcades shadowy in purple twilight, and the soft sunless light on the fountain, and the blossoming rose tree.

"Yes, I know, Gregory! I'm coming."

"No rush," Gregory said, turning away.

Chester, at her side, had time for only one more word in Pamela's ear.

"You'll trust me, won't you? I'll come down and tell you all about it—I'll get out of it, I swear I will, and without hurting any one, either. It'll take me a few weeks—tapering off—but you'll not be angry, Pamela?"

His kiss still burning her mouth, her eyes filled with the remembered charm of him, her ears with his voice, she could not be angry.

"No, no. But, come! Don't keep me wondering—waiting—again! Any day, to tea, or any time. And write me, Chester!"

"I'll write you every night!" he promised fervently. "Seeing you today—well, I know now that there's nobody else"

They were close to the others.

"Then you'd forgotten that?" Pamela could say significantly, cheerfully.

Chester made no attempt to hide his chagrin and self-contempt.

"I'm an ass! But it was all mixed up—it was all—no, it was all my fault!" he said.

Then Pamela was surrounded, and there was a bustle of goodbys and departures. The Archers and the Beavers and the Lees and the other Archers and the Billingses were going, and it had been so lovely, so charming, so sweet to have the old rancho really opened again—and Pam must telephone, any day—and there must be a lunch at the club—and she must se the new card room. . . .

Pamela stood at the patio arch, and Maria ran for wraps, and the big cars, parked in a circle about the outer garden, sputtered and roared and wheeled away, one by one, leaving the oil-stained and wheel crushed young grass in their wake. It was twilight in the patio, but out here a clear light lingered over the sea, and little red clots of sunshine hung high up in the oaks and eucalyptus. There was a smell of sweet Indian grass and tarweed, and of the first dews on the dry dust.

From the gateway arch Pamela could see the long descending line of the barns meeting the long level line of the quiet sea; smoke was rising from the cabins, and men and dogs and babies were idling before the dark little doorways, fed and weary and content, enjoying the last hour of the summer day.

There came to the girl's heart one of those moments of utter felicity that are rare even in the happiest lifetime. The world seemed to smile at her, and her own soul to be reconciled and lifted into the eternal beauty that is always close to the earthly beauty of a spring sunset.

Had she analyzed her emotions, she might have said that she was glad to have the social occasion that had given her so much concern successfully ended, that it was pleasant to be young and fairly comely, standing in the glory of an old adobe doorway, looking down at a gracious June sea. She might have said that the praise and the friendship and the quiet evening ahead were all good things upon which to muse. And above all she might have said that to have Chester back in her life again—nearer and dearer than before, seeking her out for his confidences, sharing with her his troubles, catching her to his heart for his almost angry kisses—that this was the crown of her happiness and the underlying secret of it all.

But she did not analyze tonight; she merely felt. She felt the atmosphere of affection and harmony about her, and she breathed for a few minutes, the very air of paradise.

Happiness shone in her face; Sam, Harry, Dick, Kent, saying their goodbys, told her that she was prettier than ever. Chester, who, with the Catherwoods, was the last to go, did not have to say it aloud; his eyes said it.

He escorted his old uncle carefully to the car; there was time merely for his "I'll write tonight!" and Pamela's nod, before Sue Rose and her mother came to say good-by last of all.

The patio was deserted now; the guests had drifted away. There was left only Gregory, who was lying on the grass talking to a still alert and untiring grandmother, and Charteris, who lay with closed eyes, a half-smile on his lips Napkins and teacups were strewn about on chairs and ledges, the grass between the flags was trampled flat, and the basket chairs had been scattered at every angle. Pamela thought, with a little prick of mirth, that as soon as the Catherwoods were gone, now that the tea party was over the family would have some tea.

Sue Rose, departing with enthusiastic praises, kissed her; and Sue Rose's mother, which was the more amazing, kissed her, too. It was an agreeable change in attitude, the wiser and older Pamela reflected, but puzzling. They repeated that she was positively coming in to spend the night next week—any night, any time!

Sue Rose was in lemon organdy, with more lemon organdy underneath it and little violet ribbons trailing from a great violet silk chrysanthemum on her shoulder; her hat was lemon straw with another chrysanthemum on it and more little twisted velvet ribbons straggling across its transparent gauze brim. Pamela could see the whole outfit in Elaine Mulligan's show window, and could hear Sue Rose deciding, "Oh, I want that. I think it's the most adorable thing I ever saw!"

Mrs. Catherwood was in tan; silk gown, silk coat, silk hat, gloves and stockings; all the same shade of coffee and cream. The Catherwoods, mother and daughter, had no other interest in life as vital as that of their clothes.

ART at the BARCELONA EXPOSITION

By ADA RAINEY

Barcelona, Sept. 21.

IT is significant that art has the chief place in the great exposition that is being held in Barcelona. The large and harmonious Palacio Nacional is at once the largest building of the exposition and the center of the great court toward which all interests converge. About this large building center all the other buildings, and the splendid fountain, with the falls coming down from the hill on which is the grand palace, makes a unique and impressive picture.

The Spanish architect knows what he is doing, and he knows how to plan for simple architectural effects which can be so impressive. The general lines of the exposition are simple, straight and almost severe, broken at times by ornament and color used with restraint and understanding. The entrance opens from the large Plaza Espange and is flanked by two buildings of renaissance style. The large avenue, Regina Maria Cristina is bordered on both sides by buildings of Spanish type which lead up to the palace of art at the top of long flights of stairs, skillfully arranged to form a decorative ensemble which, with the fountains and waterfalls and with the tall decorative standards of light, makes really a picture of brilliancy and beauty that will not soon be forgotten. All the structures are of permanent materials and have not that impermanent appearance which is often associated with expositions.

Barcelona is a beautifully situated city, the largest on the Mediterranean, and boasts over 1,000,000 inhabitants. Two high mountains bound the city, and within this semicircle lies the city, basking in almost perennial sunshine. The climate is mild and delightful. The city is modern and around its ancient center, where is the old Gothic cathedral, and from which radiate narrow streets, it has spread out in many directions. There are broad streets large open squares which have been tastefully decorated with sculpture and fountains and many modern apartment houses and business structures, all forming a harmonious and unusually attractive city. There is an air of gayety and general well-being here which is more noticeable than in any other city in Spain that I have seen.

But the center of interest in the exposition, as has been said, is the large palace of art which contains a history of art in Spain through the ages. Art is appreciated in Spain and is recognized as being of real importance and is not relegated to the background. It has played an important part in the history of the nation. Her greatest men have been artists, writers, sculptors and bul'ders of the great cathedrals that formed her ancient splendor.

The art collection has been skillfully arranged by Dr. Joaquin Montauer, professor of art of the Barcelona University. The story is dramatically told and the different periods and epochs marked forcefully. For instance, there is an historical epoch in Spanish history which is illustrated with sculptured figures arranged to form a picture which has to do with an event of importance. These episodes are fifteen in number and have been designed and modeled by a group of artists in Barcelona. The pictures are life size in three dimensions and are artistic creations and tell a story effectively of these events. Each of these pictures stands for an epoch in art as well and are placed chronologically and are surrounded by the art of the period.

In one of the pictures, for instance, there is shown the so-called "Catholic Kings," who are really Ferdinand and Isabella receiving Columbus, who is telling them about his discoveries in the New World. He has brought with him some of the Indians to prove his achievement. The whole is treated decoratively and imaginatively and not like a scene from Mrs. Jarley's wax works. The tapestries hang from the walls in the throne room of the palace. The scene is one of splendor and magnificence appropriate to the subject. This is the keynote of the large room which is filled with treasures of the time. Here are, for instance, some splendid tapestries, made in the royal factories in Madrid and illustrating scenes of conquest of the times and religious scenes as well. These tapestries are loaned by the present king and are from the palace in Madrid. Then there are gold and silver reliquaries made in this period, as well as precious gems and various articles of the goldsmith's art. Nearly every object shown is of Spanish art with but a few exceptions.

There is a small gold and enameled figure of an infant Christ which was done by Benevenuto Cellini, which is seen with a group of jeweled crucifixes and other objects of art. This is one of the great treasures of the collection.

Here are to be seen some splendid examples of wood sculpture of the period and church vestments of much splendor. In fact, the epoch is re-created for us with all its pageantry and magnificence. Art here has been made to assume a real meaning. It is very different from an ordinary museum collection. The human element is introduced and the vestments prove that magnificent fabrics embroidered with gold and jewels were used by the priests and bishops at that time. The interiors of the churches were splendid with the gold of the sculptured figures which glowed from the altars which were adorned with the paintings of famous artists of the time.

Art in Barcelona is more splendid that at Seville. There is more here, the collections are more complete and are arranged so that the observer can more easily understand the relation of history to the art. It is really a magnificent pageant of beautiful and priceless works of art that excel in richness and in number any other one collection that I have seen elsewhere. To describe it in detail would be impossible, for there are nearly 5,000 objects of real value.

The tapestries were in most perfect state of preservation and seemed countless. The Gothic group is particularly rich. Many of them came from the cathedral in Lerida, which is near Barcelona. The scenes, mostly religious, are wrought with much attention to episode and picturesque detail, the color soft and the work decorative.

The group of wood sculptures, which I have spoken of many times, is rich and begins with the primitive sculpture and extends to the latest examples of renaissance times. Wood sculpture is distinctively Spanish, as no other country has done much with this form of art. In Spain it culminated in great delicacy of workmanship and deep religious feeling shown in the conceptions of the several artists.

Art has been traced from pre-Roman days through the early Romanesque times when primitive painting and enamel work were so rich, so true in feeling. No pains have been spared to make the exhibits complete and understandable. There have been reproduced whole facades of the Romanesque cathedrals. The facade of the cathedral at Santiago, a portal of the cathedral at Avila and many capitals of Visigothic times can be here studied intelligently.

Art is traced through paintings from the earliest primitives so replete with religious feeling to the present day men. There are fine examples of Berruguete, a lovely Annunciation and a Salutation of the Virgin and many others. There are several of the finest of the paintings by El Greco and some portraits by Goya and the paintings of Coeleo, Ribalta and Ribeara.

Then there are four large rooms which contain the works of the four outstanding artists of Spain today. This is the culmination of the art of the collection. Here is a room of the forceful paintings of Zuloaga, which have already been written about in The Post, but not of course these particular paintings. Zuloaga considers these his best and most representative works. Here the heart of Spain is spread out for all to read. The central painting is a large Crucifixion treated in a significant manner. It is entirely different from any other Crucifixion that I have seen. It is replete with tragic emotion which is reflected on the faces and in the postures of the group around the cross. Just next to this is a group of toreadors which represent another side of Spanish feeling and life. Next to this is a portrait of a cardinal with figure attending him that represents the church today. On the opposite side of the room are two nude figures that are sensual to a degree with little to redeem them. In between are figures of Spanish gypsies, dancing girls in gorgeous Spanish shawls glowing with vitality, and alongside of these merry figures are women who have tasted the cup of bitterness to the dregs and then again a portrait of a woman of the haute monde in modern evening gown. But the landscapes of Zuloaga are most to my liking. They are Spanish to the core and are portraits of Spain herself, splendidly constructed and masterfully painted. The artist is at his best in them. He has the power to convey emotion in the background of a painting, be it a portrait or a landscape. He gives us a deep rich color laid on with great swirls of the brush that somehow give the real meaning of the painting.

Manuel Benedito, whom I had the pleasure of meeting in Madrid and wrote back about him in my letter from Madrid, is another of the men represented. But here it is possible to get a comprehensive idea of his work that it was impossible to do in the few paintings that he had in his studio in Madrid. There is the large "Return From the Hunt," which is illustrative in intent. Here also are several portraits of society women that are very well done. One in particular is excellent, showing a woman in a black velvet gown half reclining on a green divan with a brilliant green background which has been skillfully handled. Another, in a black skirt with a lace mantilla falling to her waist with the flesh seen through the lace. This is a masterpiece of technical painting.

There are several portraits of gypsies where the artist is seen at his best. These portraits are colorful, strong in modeling and sincerely done. A nude figure with a basket of fruit is also technically faultless. His several heads of peasants are convincing and interesting.

In the sotomayor room the outstanding painting is the portrait of the Queen of Spain. Queen Eugenia Victoria is a beautiful woman, tall, blonde and of striking presence. She makes an ideal picture of a queen. She is posed against a background showing the Palace of Madrid with the city in the distance. There are other portraits of much distinction. Mostly are they conceived in the manner of the eighteenth century, although they are wholly modern in treatment. A large canvas is of a Spanish fiesta with a merry group of [illegible] figures are [illegible] moniously blended. Another canvas of like nature is the interior of a peasant's cottage with a group of figures seated around a table partaking of their evening meal. There is much vitality and interest in the treatment of these scenes. However, one gets the impression that the work of this painter, who is a thorough technician, is rather more artificial than the other men mentioned. He has been court painter to King Alfonso and has painted many of the court beauties of the day. He is a skillful colorist and invests his backgrounds with an atmospheric charm and a delightful color.

The most splendid and the greatest decorative artist of all is Anglada Comarasa, who has the fourth room for his paintings. These four painters represent entirely different points of view in painting. Three of them are portrait painters, yet how different is their work. The personality of the artist is always of chief interest and the way he paints is what gives the charm and allure to art. This is proved in these four rooms. All of the artists are distinguished and do well what they set out to do.

Anglada had an exhibition of his paintings in Washington in what was then the Vandyck Gallery and which, unfortunately, has since been abandoned. But Washingtonians were treated to a wonderful exhibition of paintings. Here there are some larger canvases and a few of those shown in Washington, notably two or three decorative figures. Anglada lives in the Belearic Islands, which are only a night's sail from Barcelona, but has come to the city to superintend the installation of his paintings.

He is purely a decorative artist and can not be held to the standards of realistic and representative art. His largest canvas is of a fiesta in Seville. It is glowing with color, scintillating with life and the glamour of exotic Seville. It is a pageant painted with fervor and emotion. There is more emotion in Anglada's paintings than in those of most artists and perhaps for this reason he is such a great artist. He is not in any way concerned with the scenes of every-day people and things. His painting is nothing if not exaggerated, exotic and imaginative. But it is impressive and he is brilliant and an original painter. One of his canvases is of a group of guitar players, who are swayed with emotion by the music they are playing. It is an impressive group rhythmical and woven into a pattern made by the swaying figures of the men, a creation of a strange world. All is here dark, somber and lugubrious. The other canvases are brilliant with color, which is the chief glory of Anglada.

Before speaking of the modern art building the brilliant effect of the illumination of the buildings and grounds at the exposition must be described, for it is the most artistic effect in the whole exposition.

As at Seville the old and the new were blended in the large central palace, here the old and the modern are united in a picture of consummate loveliness. Electricity has provided the means for the beauty of the picture and the fountains and the tall obelisks of glass are the instruments to bring out the fairylike charm. From the National Palace, which is on the tall hill of Montjuich down hundreds of steps, falls the water which makes the connecting link between the past and the present. The water falls in cascades to a large central fountain, which is in turn surrounded by many smaller fountains which rise from the sides. Then the long central avenue, Maria Cristina, is flanked on both sides by tall obeliaks in glass which are modern in design and intent. At night these obeliaks of translucent glass glow with colored lights which blend with the varying colors of the lights reflected in the fountains. Not even at Versailles have I seen such varied and fantastic effects when the fountains play as here. The whole picture is a masterpiece of ingenuity and charming effect.

The color and the form of the fountains are constantly changing. At one moment rosy red, then a magenta purple, then again a brilliant orange mingled with a deep sea green. From the Grand Palace and the circle of lights that surrounds it to the cascades and the flowerlike play of the waters in the central fountain the whole effect is astonishing and magnificent. It is Barcelona's contribution to the beauty of the world. It is the element which will stand as a unique mark of achievement in her crown of glory. The distinguishing note is the blending of the modern decorative note in the manner in which the effects are produced and the color of the varying forms of electricity and the playing waters. Modern and ancient here meet in a new loveliness.

BOOKS

By ELISABETH E. POE.

ON OCTOBER 7 it will be 80 years to a day since the death of Edgar Allan Poe in Baltimore, Md., on October 7, 1849. This poet of the night is approaching the 100th anniversary of his death when his fame will have survived the century test put down by Mark Twain as the one sure indication of the immortality of the genius of a man of letters.

The increasing interest in the works of Poe is one of the anomalies of literature. This attention is manifest not only in biographies of the poet but in new arrangements of his works and critical reviews of its most salient features.

His poetry and tales are fairly well known, but his essays on social and literary criticisms which are so necessary for the understanding of his creative work have been practically unknown.

Now and then attention has been called to the fact that his was a fearless—and a deadly pen to the mediocre—instrument with which to determine the literary merit of his contemporaries.

In "The Book of Poe," edited by Addison Hibbard with an introduction by Harvey Allen (Doubleday, Doran & Co., Inc., Garden City, N. Y.), new value is given to this side of the Poe tradition in an illuminating and highly satisfactory manner. Mr. Allen, well-known for his comprehensive "Israfel," a biography of Poe, outstanding in its delineation of the author of "The Raven," in his introduction gained new gratitude from the Poe cult by his exposition of the field of Poe's literary criticism. As he says the "present anthology especially fills a legitimate and long-felt want." He points out, furthermore, that Mr. Hibbard has been most conscientious in his editing in selecting those examples in "which the play of Poe's critical faculties is most evident, and to omit that in which the purely ephemeral notions of his time and place or the personal spleen of the poet himself predominated."

The editor recalls to us the fact that Poe's career as a magazine writer was most voluminous and varied. It was his great chance to obtain a hearing and he wrote into his magazine copy a literary spirit which has made the very copies of the Southern Literary Messenger, Graham's Magazine and other journals in which his work appeared priceless treasure trove of American literature. The circulation of Graham's Magazine grew from 5,000 to 37,000 after Poe had been associated with it for some months.

His fearlessness toward the Brahmins of New England and the literati of New York was fruitful of both friends and enemies. Yet time has vindicated many of his literary judgments in a striking manner. Poe as the critic, too, has had his day in the court of letters and the verdict has been in his favor.

Nor did Poe confine his critical pen to literature alone. He permitted it to play now and then upon the social follies and foibles of his day. Some of his caustic remarks in this direction receive due consideration in "The Book of Poe." As for instance, when referring to American architecture, Poe gives it this delicious definition: "It would have been Gothic," he notes, "had it not felt its duty to be Dutch."

Foremost among the autumn biographies must be rated that of "A Great Rich Man—the Romance of Sir Walter Scott," by Louise Schutz Boas. (Longmans, Green & Co., New York). Mrs. Boas had done more than given us a human biography of her great subject. She has made the literary world of the early nineteenth century live again, particularly that portion which flourished in the British Isles.

This romanticist par excellence was truly an amazing figure. His industry was prodigious, and he rose like a skyrocket into the heavens of literary fame. All that he wrote turned literally into gold, and if he had been as good a business man as he was a writer he might have been spared his last years of mental agony, chained to the wheel of creation by dire need.

Only his own romances can equal the romance of his life, the realization of his dream castle, Abbotsford, then the swift catastrophe of overwhelming debt. Yet his gallant soul did not quail. His weapon was the pen, and with it he wrought so greatly that he went to his grave freed, at last, from the chains of debt. As he lay dying the whole world asked for news of his welfare. Princes and peasants alike were interested in the fate of this man who made them forget their mundane cares through the magic of his pen. His last words to his son-in-law, Lockhart, are most worthy of quotation and were, in a sense, the epitome of his life, "My dear, be a good man," he said, "be virtuous, be religious, be a good man; nothing else will give you any comfort when you come to lie here."

Again, it is apparent that Christ as a subject of modern literature still retains a leading place. This tendency has been most noticeable during the last few seasons, and not only theologians but laymen have turned their pens to the delineation of this most perfect character in history. Two eminent biblical students, the Right Rev. Charles Fiske, Bishop of Central New York, and Prof. Burton S. Easton have united in writing "The Real Jesus" (Harper & Bros., New York City, N. Y.). As might be expected from such sources the book is certain to take a high place among the religious volumes of the year.

In it the authors have endeavored, and with more than a fair measure of success, to "give an account of the life, work and teaching of Jesus as a readable and interesting story, while yet basing the account on the reasonably assured teachings of historical criticism." Their analysis of the teachings of Christ shows anew their application to the problem of modern life. They have written with the utmost frankness of His Birth and Resurrection, and yet with an abiding reverence. As they point out, "The world has never been able to escape the mystery of His person. He has never been satisfactorily explained in terms of humanity."

One of the most valuable parts of the book is to be found in the appendices, which describe Palestine in Jesus' day and another which presents a chronology of the life of Christ.

Another religious publication of Harper & Brothers, New York, among its new fall books is "The Catholic-Protestant Mind," by Conrad Henry Moehlman.

This book comes with particular timeliness now that the recent concordat signed by the Papacy and Premier Mussolini has renewed world-wide interest in the age-old question of the relationship of church to state.

According to the claim of its publishers, this volume will be found to contain much new information upon all questions relating to the Pope's temporal sovereignty. It is written from the point of view of the Protestant, yet there is an obvious attempt in it to be fair and to present historical facts accurately. Professor Moehlman discusses the statistical side of Catholicism in this country and gives interesting figures of its growth and influence in many States.

America joins England in appreciation of the literary achievement of Henry Handel Richardson in her latest novel, "Ultima Thule" (W. W. Norton & Co., New York). The masculine name of the author is a pseudonym used by an English woman novelist following the tradition of George Eliot. Her first novel, "Maurice Guest," when published in 1908, was greeted with much acclaim and the interest in it has never waned. A like happy fate is predicted for "Ultima Thule," with its strong plot and fascinating delineation of character. Its English presentation saw the entire edition of 1,000 copies sold in a single day. Within a few weeks, on its reprinting, it was one of the best sellers of the year in the English capital.

Now the American edition has been released, it will in all probability follow the sales precedent set for it abroad.

Cast in the last part of the Victorian era it is written in that style which is so rapidly returning in vogue. This will be a count in its favor, and it is the last volume, curiously enough, of a trilogy, the other two volumes of which were not tremendous successes. The book is based on the powerful elements of woman's love and sacrifice enduring to the end through the living tragedy of a man's mental and physical breakdown, due to what appeared to be inexorable fate. Finally, it is a book that can be reread, a fact that, in itself, should go far in winning it a deserved place on the permanent fiction shelf.

Now that fall is here a book written by a Washington physician, Dr. Walter A. Wells, of Georgetown University, on "The Common Head Cold" (the MacMillan Co., New York) has many timely hints how to avoid this pest of humanity. The common cold is much more dangerous than the average person thinks, according to Dr. Wells, and it brings a crew of worse ills in its train very frequently. It is amazing to read that colds cost this country, in loss to industry, more than $450,000,000 annually.

An Attic Salt-Shaker

By W. Orton Tewson

YEARS ago, John Galsworthy was offered a knighthood. He declined the honor. That is to say, he preferred to remain Mr. John Galsworthy instead of becoming Sir John Galsworthy. It is very unusual for a writer—or any one else—to decline a handle to his name. Galsworthy did. So did Thomas Hardy. And I have always understood that Rudyard Kipling might have been "Sir Rudyard" had he desired. But they are the exceptions.

• • • •

Which funnily enough, reminds me of a story that Lord Charles Beresford—breezy, witty, sailor friend of King Edward's—used to tell. On one occasion the king said to him:

"You remember L—, that fellow at Homburg? Well, I've just made him a knight."

"Dirty little bounder," beamed Beresford. "Serves him damn well right."

• • • •

Joking apart, Galsworthy did refuse the honor. For what reason I do not know. And it is no secret that Barrie was never keen on becoming Sir James. Barrie is a baronet, which means that had he a son—which he hasn't—the title would pass to the son at his father's death. In the case of a mere knight, the title dies with the holder. The story goes that when Barrie was first offered a knighthood, he replied:

"But I don't want it."

"What do you want?" he was asked—they wanted to give him something.

"A key to Kensington Gardens," he replied.

They gave him a key.

At that time Barrie was living in the Bayswater road, facing Kensington Gardens, where the famous statue of Peter Pan stands. After they gave him a key—the only person in England to be so honored—he would often slip into the gardens at dusk (when they were closed to the general public) and spend happy hours with the fairies come to keep Peter Pan company. Not to believe that Peter Pan comes to life at dusk would be like doubting that Santa Claus and Robinson Crusoe ever lived.

• • • •

To go back to John Galsworthy. Like his father—who was a prominent London lawyer—he was destined for the law. But after being admitted to the bar, he made a trip 'round the world. Following his return he began to write and—here you are! By the way, it was during that trip 'round the world—on the sailing ship Torrens, voyaging from Australia to South Africa—that Galsworthy met Joseph Conrad, then a sailor. A friendship began between the two which only terminated at Conrad's death.

• • • •

What started me talking Galsworthy is a critical study of him and his work by a German writer, Leon Schalit. Galsworthy's original "Sin" as he calls it, was a volume of short stories, "From the Four Winds," published in 1898. He used the pseudonym, "John Sinjin," which he retained for his first novel, "Joselyn," published the following year. Both these works have since been withdrawn from circulation. So that if you happen to have a copy of either, stick to it.

A favorite story that has to do with William (Billy) Muldoon's connection with the New York State Boxing Commission involves a certain well-known politician who happens to be a friend of Muldoon's. The politician was anxious to get himself prominently into the foreground as photographers were snapping the pictures of two boxers who had just weighed in for a championship contest. The politician struck a nonchalant pose with his hands in the pockets of a coat. But he changed the position of his hands when Muldoon commented:

"Who ever heard of a politician with his hands in his own pockets?"

• • • •

Billy Muldoon—Before he gained fame as a champion wrestler and trainer of John L. Sullivan for his epic fight with Jake Kilrain—was once a New York City policeman. And thereby hangs this tale, told by Edward Van Every in his book about "The Solid Man of Sport." Muldoon was patrolling his beat one day when several excited citizens reported to him that murder was being done in a nearby house.

• • • •

Hurrying to the scene, Muldoon heard groans emanating from a room the door of which was locked. Forcing an entrance, he found on the floor in a welter of blood, a young Negress, to all appearances fatally wounded. Muldoon bent down and asked:

"Can you tell me who did this?"

"Yes, sah," came the faint answer, "a friend of mine."

Gen. Booth, founder of the Salvation Army, used to tell a story of a man in South Africa who was exceedingly successful in dealing with mule teams. Asked how he managed these stubborn creatures, he said:

"Well, when they stop and won't go on, I just pick up a handful of gravel or soil, put it in their mouths and let them taste it. Of course, they begin to go on."

"Why do you think it has that effect on them?" persisted the questioner.

"Well, I don't know," was the reply, "but I expect it changes the current of their thoughts."

• • • •

Which story I call to the attention of Dr. C. Judson Herrick, of the University of Chicago, who has written a fascinating book called "The Thinking Machine." He may have a better explanation, but not a more humorous one. Dr. Herrick, discussing conscience, recalls that Mark Twain reported that when he was a very young man he attended church and listened to a sermon in which the preacher told about conscience and enlarged upon the responsibilities resting upon us by reason of our possession of this God-given faculty.

Upon reflection Mark decided that his frail nature was not equal to so severe a strain, so he took his conscience down to the cellar and killed it with a hatchet.

Lincoln lost his mother when he was 9 years of age. Her place was taken by a stepmother, Sarah Bush Lincoln, who came to have almost as much emotional hold upon the growing boy as had his real mother. Her influence upon his education and character was by no means to be overrated, says Lloyd Lewis (in "Myths After Lincoln"), although the old, old lady in after years said humbly and sweetly:

"My mind and his went together, what little I had."

• • • •

Winston Churchill's visit to the New World reminds me of a story he tells about an American newspaper man who called on him one evening at the close of a very busy day. When the reporter had been admitted, Winnie said to him:

"You ought to feel yourself highly honored, young man. Do you know I have turned down seven of your compatriots already today?"

"I know," replied the reporter. "I'm them."

• • • •

It is on record that when Winston Churchill, the novelist, first began to write his way into fame, he received an indignant protest from Winston Churchill, the war correspondent—then beginning his political career—about the unwarranted use of the latter's name. The American writer replied:

"Dear Sir: How interesting! Is there another Winston Churchill? Yours truly, WINSTON CHURCHILL."

That the former German emperor never saw an ordinary newspaper is revealed by Princess Daisy of Pless (in her memoirs). There was prepared for him a daily newspaper printed in gold, she declares. It was made up of excerpts from the press of the world, such as it was considered he might wish to read.

"This carefully edited 'Golden Journal' was for years the only medium through which news of the doings and feelings of the outside world reached the German ruler," says the princess.

Another slap at the Yellow Press.

• • • •

When he wanted to, the former kaiser could be very charming and entertaining, you will be interested to know.

"I never met a man who can remember such millions of things at the same time," pipes Princess Daisy. "Even Irish stories—which I suppose he heard in England. He repeated one in German. I nearly died of laughter. And then he half-acts when he tells stories. One evening he went on from eleven to a quarter to one."

• • • •

Talking of Irish stories recalls one about W. E. Gladstone, Grand Old Man of Victorian politics, told by Stephen Gwynn (in "Experiences of a Literary Man."). Gladstone once invited Father Healy, of Bray, Ireland—a much-loved and witty priest—to one of his famous breakfasts. There were other notables present. After breakfast Gladstone began declaiming about the doctrine of indulgence.

• • • •

Fixing a flashing eye on the priest, the Grand Old Man said:

"Father Healy, I saw with my own eyes in a church at Verona, a notice offering a remit of 40,000 years in purgatory for the sum of 200 lire. Now—what do you say to that?"

"Well," said Father Healy (telling the story to Gwynn), "I was in a fix with every one looking at me, but I thought of a way. So I said: 'It's a fair offer, and I don't see where you'd go to do better.'"

• • • •

Father Healy's wit was of the kindly brand and almost the only story in which it had a sting in it (says Mr. Gwynn) is of his answer to some vulgar people who asked him how he got on so well in fine houses.

"Faith," said Father Healy, "it must be from my mother I got it, for papa was as common as any of you."

"Ah, yes," said the banker, "but then he has expectations from his father."

"How I Became an Actor"—By Donald Ogden Stewart

WHEN I was still an orphan I remember my grandfather saying to me, "If you are a good boy and eat your oatmeal I shall take you tomorrow to see Sothern and Marlowe in 'The Taming of the Shrew.'" Well, you may imagine my excitement. I ate my oatmeal and drank my milk and cut the grass and split some kindling, gave my Aunt Sarah her absinthe frappe and could hardly sleep a wink all night. The next afternoon, dressed in my best suit, I sat between my grandfather and Aunt Sarah in row G of the old Great Southern Theater in Columbus and waited for the curtain to rise.

Finally, after what seemed to me an insufferable amount of music, the house lights became dim, the orchestra disappeared through a small door and the curtain rolled up. The stage was empty, but in a few seconds appeared a man in a dress suit.

"That's Sothern," whispered my grandfather, excitedly.

Sothern advanced to the front of the stage, whistling a pleasant tune, and began rolling up the sleeves of his dress coat. Then, still whistling, he extracted an egg from his pocket, put the egg in a yellow silk handkerchief and, after a few passes, flipped the handkerchief and out flew a large white pigeon.

"They've changed the plot quite a little," remarked my grandfather.

"I like it, though," I said eagerly.

"He isn't as good as Booth," said my grandfather. "There was an actor!"

The performance continued. Sothern took coins from the air, rabbits from a silk hat and finally a geranium from my grandfather's beard.

"I don't seem to remember Booth doing that," said my grandfather, "but I guess it's because I am getting old."

I was in the seventh heaven of delight. I loved "The Taming of the Shrew."

Finally there appeared upon the stage a beautiful lady dressed in Oriental costume. She walked up to a bench and lay down with folded arms.

"That must be Marlowe," whispered my grandfather, trying to consult his program. "I wish I had brought my glasses."

Very slowly and very mysteriously Sothern lifted Marlowe's body into the air—without touching it! That, to one young lad at least, was the deciding moment in his career. That was the point at which he solemnly resolved to devote the rest of his life to the stage. And the memory of that resolve lingered long after we had waked Aunt Sarah up and gone home—even after grandfather had found his glasses and discovered that he had apparently got the tickets for the wrong week. I was irrevocably determined to become an actor.

But fate intervened. The Maine was sunk in Havana Harbor. The feeling between Spain and this country became tense. Bugles sounded in every home, and on every lip was some syllable of the fateful word "war." The President called for volunteers and I decided to give up my career. Inflamed with patriotism, I determined to beat my sock and buskin into a sword.

But once more fate intervened. At times, indeed, it has seemed to me as though there was a guiding finger which has directed my life—a guiding finger that pointed always in the direction of the stage. At any rate the Spanish-American War was brought to a conclusion without my participation, and at the age of 9 (going on 10) the path of Keane and Booth was once more open to me.

The rest, of course, is history. How I was elected vice president of the East High School Dramatic Club, how I went to Exeter and created the role of another waiter in the annual play, how I attracted the attention of Maude Adams by my offstage noises at the Yale production of "Love's Labor Lost," and finally how I accepted the part of Nick Potter in Mr. Arthur Hopkins' production of Philip Barry's "Holiday," all that is too well known to the world at large for me to comment further. Suffice it to say that I am very happy to have found at last my true vocation, and if I have given pleasure to the thousands who have come to see me I can only say, like my great forerunner, David Garrick, "the play's the thing."

THE FOOLISH VIRGIN—By KATHLEEN NORRIS

Pamela, weary, happy, accepted their farewells.

"Oh, thank you! Oh, wasn't it? And isn't she amazing? Eighty-four, you know. Gregory's father—or no, it's Col. Charteris' father—would be 60, if he were living."

"She's wonderful," said Mrs. Catherwood. "But there's just one thing, Gregory," she said to her host, who was with Pamela at the gate; "your grandmother hasn't lived in America for so long—she may not appreciate that we have—well, we've left a good deal of our pioneer days behind us!"

"You mean that book of hers—her memoirs?" Gregory asked, with his sudden flash of charming and sophisticated and Spanish smile.

"Yes, I do mean that," Mrs. Catherwood assented, maternal and warning. "It's a dangerous thing to do, you know—and perhaps she doesn't realize that memory isn't a very safe guide . . ."

"Oh, she has all the old files of that newspaper!" Pamela said innocently. "I've not seen them but they—they'd be definite, wouldn't they?"

"I don't know whether they would be or not," Mrs. Catherwood, who seemed inexplicably disturbed, said shortly. "It seems to me that I'd—I'd go very slowly with it, Gregory."

"Well, she hasn't started yet," Gregory said, with the veiled expression that made him look so foreign. "She says she's going to get into it with Pamela in a week or two. It ought to be darned interesting!" he added ingenuously.

"Yes, it might be——" Mrs. Catherwood agreed in an absentminded, rather hardlipped manner. "But, after all, one has to think of people's feelings!" she added, in a dissatisfied voice.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Sue Rose, demure, mischievous, frightened, irresolute, and tremendously determined, by turns, was looking at Pamela. Now she said impulsively, daringly:

"Mother, mayn't I tell just Pam?"

Mrs. Catherwood immediately brought a reproachful and protestant glance to rest upon her daughter, pursed her lips, shook her head, and elevated her eyebrows as if she were shocked.

"No, indeed, you may not, you naughty girl!"

"Oh, please, mother!" Sue Rose begged childishly.

"No, of course not! We said New Years. Is this New Years?" demanded the mother inflexibly. But she was smiling.

"Mother! Just Pam?"

"No, dear! There's somebody else we have to consult, you madcap," Mrs. Catherwood said, in a fond undertone.

"Oh, I know, Mother! But he wouldn't care!" Sue Rose, the timidest and most self-conscious and sensitive of mortals, had always liked, in moments of high spirits, the delusion that she was a reckless dealer in hearts. Now she tossed her head and grasped Pamela's shoulders, and Pamela, with her face all roses, said eagerly:

"Oh, Sue Rose Catherwood! You're engaged!"

"No, no, now—this won't do!" Mrs. Catherwood interposed with real concern. "She had no business to say a word about it, Pamela. It is only an understanding, and she promised me—she promised me that she wouldn't breathe it to any one until New Year's Day! Now, I really am vexed with you, darling, I am indeed—this is very naughty," she said warmly.

Sue Rose laughed, unabashed. Her voice was high with mischief.

"But, mother, these things will out! They're in the air."

"In the air or not in the air," Mrs. Catherwood said disapprovingly, "you've said too much not to go on now. Tell Pamela—did you ever see such a crazy girl, Pam!—and then promise me that not another soul shall know!"

"I promise!" Sue Rose, scarlet and stammering, blurted out the name. It seemed to scream itself through the air.

Pamela's soul left her body for a few seconds, returned to it jarred and blind and suffocating. She was all right, she struggled to say, deep within her. She was all right. This was the patio gateway, and these persons—who were they?—were going away.

The sweat came out on her hands and forehead, and her head ached as if it had been hit with a mallet; her throat was very dry. She groped—groped for consciousness—she had her arms about some one, was kissing Sue Rose. She heard herself say, "Well, Sue Rose!"

The patio garden and the rocking arcade settled down into place, and she was all right. Quite all right. Only she could not look at her companions' faces, somehow, and she was breathing hard. But nothing had been noticeable—no one had seen anything amiss. Sue Rose—announcing her engagement to—to Chester Hilliard.

"I should say I did!" This was Pamela Raleigh, in answer to Sue Rose's arch, "You ought to sympathize with me, because you had a regular crush on him yourself last summer, didn't you, Pam?"

"I should say I did!" And then Sue Rose, all giggles and shy pride again.

"Oo-oo-oo, and wasn't I the jealous!"

Pamela's head ached fiercely, blindingly. Some one was beside her. Had he been there throughout? Had he heard? Gregory, of course.

"Pam, I'm sorry," Gregory said smoothly. "But Anita's burned her hand in the kitchen—it looks awful bad——"

"And we must run—it's disgraceful!" This was Mrs. Catherwood.

Pamela did not see them go; she did not know how she got to the kitchen. In the big, darkening room the maids, still in holiday spirits, were lazily attacking the heaped tea dishes.

Nobody had been burned. Their dark, curious eyes searched her strangly pale face, with the oddly glittering eyes, amusedly. Nobody had been burned, senorita.

Then Gregory must have heard. Not that it mattered.

She said something vaguely, absently, not knowing what she said, and went on into the shadows of the dining room. Gregory was standing by the stairway door.

"Everything all right?" he said. The girl stared at him a second, wondering what was changed in him. He looked older—thinner—oddly fierce, somehow.

"No one was burned," she said lifelessly.

"I thought they said something about Anita being burned. They were all jabbering like parrots" he said curtly. "You had better go upstairs and lie down, Pamela. You're all in!"

"Oh, no—I'm all right," she stammered, surprised at his manner.

She put her hand on the white china knob that opened the door upon the stairs, wavered, and turned toward the garden.

"That—Miss Catherwood is going to marry Mr. Hilliard," she said.

"I heard her say so," Gregory said briefly.

Pamela raised her dark-rimmed eyes; she looked pathetically shrunken and small and helpless somehow.

"I feel as if there must be some mistake!" she faltered, with a little desperate laugh. "I told you—this morning—only this morning——"

Again the quick and positive manner; he seemed ten years older than the boy he had been only this morning.

"Anything you've told me I've forgotten of course," he said briefly, almost coldly, as if he were annoyed.

"I don't—understand it!" Pamela whispered.

Gregory shrugged. His face, almost as bronzed and dark as an Indian's, was expressionless—it was as if he was not interested. He had put on white flannels for the tea. Pamela wondered if it was the strange costume that made the man look so unfamiliar.

"There may be some explanation," he offered, with a curious effect of lifelessness, with an impersonal, steady look into her eyes.

"Explanation!" Her voice broke upon a breathless, scornful laugh, and the hand on the old china door knob shook.

But to whom was she talking? This squarely built dark-skinned, polished and inscrutable Spaniard in his white flannels was surely not the awkward and blundering American boy who had gathered leaves with her in the woods this morning—this was not the young rustic who always laughed noisily and became clumsily incoherent when she was about? Pamela, shaken by her own utter bewilderment of spirit on Chester's account, was additionally confused by the discovery of another identity in Gregory. She had only had glimpses of this man before! the cowboys' "senor," lord of some 40 big cattlemen and some 4,000 widespread acres, half-Latin, all self-possession and easy Spanish poise.

She peered at him, in the low-ceiled, dark old dining room. Who was this man, anyway?

"Gregory has something happened? Are you cross at me?"

"Why should I be cross at you?" The white teeth flashed in the dark face. "No, but I will be, if you don't go upstairs and rest," he said, not urgently, not dictatorially, still with the detached air of advising a wearied child for its own good. "Go upstairs and lie down, Pamela. You look ill."

She stared pathetically for a minute or two into the inscrutable face. Then she went upstairs. She must think of Gregory—how funny he had been—how unlike the man she had known for all these weeks.

She would think of Gregory, while she bathed her face and ran a deep comb through her tawny mane—Gregory—Gregory. . . .

She sat down on the edge of her bed. And the words formed themselves like iron chains in her soul, and dragged her down—dragged her down. . . .

Sue Rose Catherwood and Chester—to be married. Chester in love with Sue Rose.

Her throat thickened and her temples throbbed, and she felt her hands wet against each other. But of course it wasn't true!

Chester kissing Sue Rose—Chester saying, "When we are married," to Sue Rose! But of course it wasn't true.

"I mustn't think about it. Whatever's happened—or going to happen—won't be altered by my thinking about it. I'll just go mad—thinking. Chester Chester! I've got to go downstairs, and act as if nothing had happened—I wish I didn't feel so sick. I feel as if I had been ill—months and months. I wonder if Bob felt like this when his wife died. Oh, my God——!"

She knelt down by the bed, and buried her face in her hands, and clutched her hair with tense fingers as if she would tear it out. She knelt there a long time.

After a while she walked to the window, and looked out. The garden was dusky now; she could hardly distinguish, from the general shadow, the outlines of the old fountain and the great tumbled mass of the rose bush and the winding paths of the mellowed old flags.

A tangle of lilies, over by the patio wall, shone with the opaque luster of mother-of-pearl in the gloom. From the kitchendoorway, through the arches, came tunnels of soft golden light across the dusk. And on the cooling air the scent of roses and trampled grass and wallflowers and heliotrope rose to the window, and a cool evening breeze touched her hot cheek.

No use to stand here and think. No use to try to think! She went downstairs. The old lady was in her chair, and Charteris in his, reading lazily, desultorily aloud; Gregory was not in the room. The lamps were lighted; a drop light over Charteris' shoulder, and a great standing lamp with a shade that bloomed like a little green umbrella. But nobody could see her face, and nobody seemed to suspect that anything was wrong. The room was confined and close after the sweet airness out of doors, even though all the windows were open and the great shutters folded back.

Charteris did not stop reading when she came downstairs, nor did the old woman look up. Pamela could sink into a shadowed chair and recover what calm she might, unnoted.

"Doesn't any one want any dinner?" she asked, when Charteris closed the book.

"I do," he said. "Maria's getting it. I believe it's an artichoke, toast and a baked apple."

"I'm having the toast and the apple and a glass of hot milk," said Mrs. Chard.

"And where's Gregg? It's after seven."

"I believe," Charteris said blandly, "I believe that Gregg has gone out to look at the moon. Well! Didn't you think that, on the whole, we had rather a filling afternoon? My grandmother here is sitting meditating upon her sins—she blackmailed the whole community, as nearly as I can find out."

"I did not!" said the old lady, with a sinister, deep chuckle. "Anyway, blackmail on a large scale is respectable, like everything else on a large scale."

They discussed the tea idly. Pamela, from her seclusion, could identify this caller and that for them; she was surprised, she said, that the mention of this old file of Carterbridge papers could interest them so.

"You wouldn't think they could remember things so long ago."

"Oh, they have very good memories, indeed," said Mrs. Chard. "What worries them is the refreshing of other people's memories!"

Pamela's head ached; she was glad to sit still. She felt numbed and exhausted—too tired, too dazed, even to think. Gregory came in and began to talk, a brisk and stern and authoritative Spanish gentleman.

"I don't know why you remind me of your great-grandfather tonight, Gregory," said Mrs. Chard. "I mean Don Aindini. He was a great ladies' man, that one," she added reminiscently.

"What's happened to you?" Charteris asked, wonderingly, in the first pause.

"Nothing at all," Gregory answered unsmilingly, almost with an easy insolence. "Come on, Pamela; we have to eat!" he said.

She went with him to the table, but she could eat nothing. Gregory made her drink some tea, her first that day.

"My head aches," she explained simply, "and I feel tired."

"You ought to be!" Gregory said. "That Catherwood girl impresses me as a liar," he added, with apparent irrelevance. Pamela could manage a forlorn laugh.

"I don't think she was lying," she said briefly, quietly.

"Maybe not!" Gregory agreed indifferently. Looking up, in the dimly lighted room, she saw that his dark eyes, glinting in his Indian-brown face, were fixed upon her. A match and a cigarette were held between her face and his, but his hands were arrested for the moment; he was watching her.

UNCLE SAM and the HOME-MAKER

ONE of Uncle Sam's chief aids in homemaking for the Nation is the Department of Agriculture, which in many bureaus pays special attention to the development of this necessary and fine art. The clients of the department are to be found not only in rural America but in many city homes as well.

The splendid service of the Bureau of Home Economics of the Department of Agriculture to homemakers generally is well known. The work of this bureau since its organization is responsible, in large measure, for improved standards of homemaking throughout the country, so widespread has been its benefactions to the American home.

But it would be difficult to enumerate without omission all of the activities of other bureaus of the department that affect home interests. To mention but a few of them: The Bureau of Good Roads is concerned with home sanitation, sewage disposal, heating plants, plumbing and farm architecture; the Bureau of Chemistry and Soils has various laboratories working on commercial food products and practices and on leather and paint; the Bureau of Animal Industry, similarly, has been in charge of the Federal meat inspection, and the development of all farm practices affecting live stock, including poultry, hence meat and poultry products as food.

Then the Bureau of Dairying is interested in the increasing use of milk and milky products; the province of the Bureau of Plant Industry is the growing, storing and the preservation of food plants, and also the beautification of the farmstead through flowers and landscaping; the Bureau of Entomology helps the homemaker deal with insect pests of the household; the Biological Survey not only shows the housewife how to get rid of rats and mice, but also how to raise rabbits or buy a fur coat; the Bureau of Agricultural Economics is working on improved practices in the standardization and distribution of food products.

In this machine age this guidance is of utmost value to the housewife. Of course, it would not be fair to wish women back into the endless grind of baking, canning, spinning, weaving, sewing, washing, cleaning that fell to their lot before machines came to their rescue. Moreover, in this day when so many women are forced to be wage earners working outside the home, they have neither the time nor energy to perform all the household jobs they did some decades ago.

Hundreds of thousands of women now have a double role to perform, since they are not only wage earners but homemakers, mothers and potential mothers. They need and welcome all the aids which modern science and industry furnish. Someone has recently pointed out that today, thanks to the present use of energy materials, every person in the United States has the equivalent of 30 servants.

The Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor has compiled some interesting figures on women—homemakers of some kind or other—in industry, based on the last census.

In many senses of the word, they are a monument to woman's ability and progress and a reminder of the need to study their problems even more than good old Uncle Sam is doing today.

The United States has over 8,000,000 women gainfully employed, more than one-fifth of them in manufacturing and mechanical industries.

A simple frock for school or play.

All but 35 of the 572 occupations listed by the census employ women.

One in every five wage earners is a woman.

One in every four wage-earning women is married.

One in every eleven married women is a wage earner.

One in every five wage-earning women is under 20 years of age; one in every five or six is more than 44 years of age.

The majority of women workers, both married and single, contribute to the support of others, their earnings being an important factor in the family budget.

SLEEP FOR INFANTS.

(Children's Bureau, Department of Labor.)

A very young baby should sleep from 18 to 22 hours out of 24; during the second and third months from 18 to 20 hours. When he is 6 months old he should sleep twelve hours at night without interruption, save possibly for one evening feeding. At this age he will probably sleep two hours, both morning and afternoon, but should not sleep after 3 o'clock, in order that he may be ready to go to bed at 6 o'clock in the evening. The long period of night sleeping should be continued throughout childhood, but the daytime naps may be gradually shortened. At 1 year of age the baby may require one long and one short nap during the day. In the second year the two naps are merged into one, which may continue from one to two hours in the middle of the day. Even if the child does not sleep all this time, the habit of resting in a quiet room is of great value. He should be provided with the best possible sleeping accommodations, so that the hours of sleep may be of the greatest value. He should always sleep in a bed by himself, and whenever possible in a room by himself, where he need not be disturbed by the presence of other persons, and where light, warmth, and ventilation may be adjusted to his particular needs. Not a few young babies have been smothered while lying in bed with older persons, some part of whose body was thrown over the baby's face during heavy sleep.

Never give a baby any sort of medicine to induce sleep. All soothing sirups or other similar preparation contain drugs that are bad for the baby, and many of them are exceedingly dangerous. Many babies die every year from being given such medicines. The baby should never be allowed to go to sleep with anything in the nature of a pacifier in his mouth. Thumb and finger-sucking babies will rebel fiercely at being deprived of this comfort when they are going to sleep, but this must be done if the habit is to be broken up. The baby ought to have a reasonably quiet place in which to sleep, but he should be taught to sleep through the ordinary household noises, unless they are unduly disturbing. It should not be necessary to walk on tiptoe and talk in whispers while the baby sleeps, provided he has a quiet place for his daytime naps.

Stuffed tomatoes are a wholesome relish, easily prepared.

Timely Tested Recipes from The Bureau of Home Economics

(Department of Agriculture.)

Stuffed Tomatoes.

6 large firm tomatoes.
4 to 6 strips bacon.
2 tablespoons chopped parsley.
1 tablespoon minced onion.
1 cup dry bread crumbs.
¼ teaspoon celery seed.
½ teaspoon salt.
⅛ teaspoon pepper.
½ cup buttered bread crumbs.

Wash the tomatoes, remove a thin slice from the stem end, and carefully scoop out the pulp so that the tomato will not be broken. Fry the bacon until crisp, remove from the pan, and break the bacon into small pieces. Add the parsley and onion to the fat cook for two or three minutes, add the cup of dry bread crumbs, celery seed, salt, pepper, crisped bacon and tomato pulp. Stir until well mixed and add more salt if necessary. Fill the tomato cups with this mixture and cover the top with the buttered crumbs. Put the stuffed tomatoes in a pan in a moderate oven and cook until the tomatoes are tender and the crumbs are brown. Serve from the baking dish.

Ice Cream Sandwich.

(Bureau of Home Economics, Department of Agriculture.)

Ice cream need not always be served in the same way—sliced from a brick, or dipped up by the spoonful. Borrow a suggestion from the caterer and treat the family to an "ice cream sandwich" once in a while. As it's a dessert, the substantial part of the sandwich is appropriately made of cage—sponge cake or angel food. Make the sponge cake by your own preferred recipe, or by the one below, given by the Bureau of Home Economics. Bake it in a square or oblong pan, in a layer thick enough to split horizontally with a sharp knife when you are ready to combine it with the ice cream. Use any flavor of ice cream you like to put between the layers. One large "sandwich" on a platter makes an attractive dessert when it comes to the table, or you may find it more convenient to cut the cake into individual portions or to bake it in muffin rings and fill each one separately with the ice cream.

Other variations are easily made. Chocolate, butterscotch, or fruit sauce may be served with the "ice cream sandwich," or whipped cream, sweetened and flavored. Any form of ice cream sandwich should be put together just before being served. If in one cake on a platter it should be cut with a thin, sharp, broad-bladed knife.

Savory Cooked Lettuce.

Many people never think of lettuce as a vegetable that may be cooked. It is, in fact, one of the valuable green-leaf vegetables depended on for vitamins and minerals, and may be eaten hot as well as raw. Green lettuce that may be rather tough for salad is good cooked, according to these directions.

1 cup diced salt pork.
3 quarts cut lettuce.
2 tablespoons vinegar.
Salt.
Onion juice, if desired.

Wash the lettuce thoroughly and cut it in pieces about three inches long. Cook the salt pork in a heavy skillet until brown and very crisp, and remove it from the fat. Add the lettuce to the hot fat and stir until it wilts. Add the vinegar and cooked salt pork and more salt if needed.

The time of cooking will vary with the lettuce, but do not cook any longer than necessary to wilt the lettuce. A small quantity of onion juice can be added with the vinegar if desired.

Chopped Spinach.

Spinach should always be cooked as little as possible, so that its vitamins will not be destroyed. All the liquid that cooks out of the leaves should be saved and served, for in it are dissolved some of the valuable minerals which the spinach contributes to the diet. Every one is familiar with the story of the little boy who was sure he could "taste the iron" in his spinach, so it is scarcely necessary to warn the good cook to wash spinach thoroughly, through five or six waters, lifting it each time from the surface of the pan so that any grit will sink. Cut off the roots before the first washing, because considerable grit is held at the base of the stems.

Wash the spinach through many waters and when all grit has been removed drain well and chop the spinach very fine. To each pound of spinach melt in a saucepan three to four tablespoons of butter and when lightly browned add the spinach. Cover the pan a few minutes until the spinach has wilted, then remove the cover, add the salt and cook for eight or ten minutes, stirring frequently. For children, serve on crisp toast to conserve the liquid.

WHY RED CEDAR CHESTS WILL PROTECT FROM MOTH DAMAGE

The unusual tightness of a well-constructed red cedar chest, when not cracked or warped, makes it of even greater advantage than an ordinary trunk or other household receptacle for storing clothing and preventing moths from getting in to lay their eggs. In addition, chests made of the heartwood of red cedar have a definite insecticidal value. The aroma of the wood kills any newly hatched or young larvae of the clothes moths, should there chance to be any unobserved moth eggs on the articles when put in the chest.

The Bureau of Entomology of the United States Department of Agriculture recommends, however, that all winter clothing subject to attack by moths should be thoroughly cleaned, brushed, beaten and, if possible, sunned before being stored during the warm weather. This treatment, if carefully done, with special attention to brushing out pockets, seams and other places of concealment, will minimize the likelihood of damage, since it will remove those stages of the moths that the chests will not kill. Cedar chests can not be depended upon to kill the moths of millers, their eggs, of the worms after they are half to full grown, or after they are 3 to 4 months old, neither will the chests kill the pupae or chrysalids. As none of these stages except the larvae are capable of injuring the garments, it is a matter of no practical importance whether or not the cedar chests kill the moths, eggs or pupae. But too much can not be said about the necessity of making sure that the clothing going into the chests is free from the older larvae or worms; otherwise losses may be sustained due to carelessness, not to the failure of the chest.

There have lately come upon the market various types of so-called cedar chests made partly of red cedar veneer rather than solid red-cedar heartwood, three-quarters of an inch thick. Chests containing a back and bottom of solid heartwood, but with ends, front and top of neutral wood veneered on the inside with one-sixteenth inch cedar, have not proved dependable as moth destroyers. Chests should contain at least 70 per cent of red cedar heartwood in the body proper. Chests made entirely of ¾-inch red-cedar heartwood, with or without covers of neutral wood, and veneered or stamped on the outside in various hardwoods or patterns to match period furniture can be had. The mere odor of cedar such as is imparted to chests of drawers, boxes, chests, &c., by thin veneers over neutral woods is of no practical value.

WOOL CHALLIS GOOD FOR CHILD'S SCHOOL DRESS

Winter months, especially north of the Mason and Dixon line, mean weather so much colder that a definite change to warm clothing must be planned for all members of the family, if they are to keep well and feel comfortable. Warm washable dresses may be made of some of the heavier close-woven fabrics, such as pique or broadcloth. Lightweight wool material may be preferred. Washable wool challis, albatross and wool georgette are all practical. While these materials will require washing from time to time they stay clean if protected with aprons while at play, and fewer garments are needed in the wardrobe.

The Bureau of Home Economics suggests this simple little dress, made with raglan sleeves for comfort and width across the chest and back. Fullness is provided by taking four large pleats in front. The wide collar is in two parts. They are bound with a bias binding harmonizing with the colors in the fabric. Binding is also used on the cuffs. One button and a loop make the fastening. The material in this case is a wool challis having red and blue figures on a tan background. Since this dress does not have bloomers to match, it is made 2 inches longer than if it were worn with bloomers of the same material. Separate bloomers of sateen or jersey harmonizing with the tan background of the fabric would be suitable.

William Lyon Phelps on Age Before Beauty

THIS frequently heard statement is a left-handed compliment; like many conventional tributes, it carries a smirk rather than a smile. Underneath the formal and hollow homage paid to the ancient the preference is, of course, elsewhere. It is somewhat like the so-called complimentary vote given to the "favorite son" at a political convention, which no one takes seriously, not even the son. Nothing would perhaps more shockingly disconcert the ballot casters than to have their candidate receive other than local support.

In the expression age before beauty it is implied that the two are incompatible; you can not have both. Yet upon a little reflection it will appear that the vast majority of objects that receive human attention become more and more beautiful with the accumulation of years. I can think of only two classes of things that are more beautiful in their early than in their later existence.

I refer first to all varieties of animal life, including man; second, to all objects whose main purpose is practical usefulness.

It ought to be obvious that kittens, puppies, baby lions, boys and girls are fairer to look upon than aged cats, rheumatic hounds, toothless lions, decrepit men, and time-worn harridans —such as guide you to your seat in the Paris theaters. It is true that the ecclesiastical poet, Dr. Donne, made a couplet comforting to some whose youth is only a memory.

Nor spring nor summer's beauty hath such grace
As I have seen in one autumnal face.

But you will observe he said "one," not many; and he had in mind not a number of charming old ladies, but just one. No doubt there are a sufficient number of exceptions to give added stability to the rule.

Browning said the reason why youth is so fair is that it would be intolerable without it; beauty is youth's only asset. Nature makes boys and girls lovely to look upon so they can be tolerated until they acquire some sense. As soon as they are able to pull their weight in the work of the world and in the intellectual clearing house of society, then grace and beauty depart. Thus mature people who have no brains and no sense are the last word in futility. They are as ridiculous as old apple blossoms which for some reason never went into fruition.

The second class of objects which are beautiful only in youth are those which are built mainly for use. The purpose of an automobile is to go. A motor car one year old is better than when ten years old; it is also more attractive to the eye. I suppose Americans are the only people in the world who often buy new cars. If an Englishman has a car that carries him satisfactorily, he keeps it; the American "turns it in." There is no more striking evidence of the "prosperity" of the American people than the two-fold fact of the abundance of new cars, and also—amazing, when you think about it—that the tremendously efficient T-model Ford was not sufficiently lovely to pay for its continued manufacture.

When I was a boy, the number of my acquaintances whose fathers owned a horse and carriage could be counted on the fingers of one hand, like those who now own a steam yacht; the fact that the old Ford car is not "good enough" indicates how times have changed. For the proper epitaph for the T-model we should have to adapt the words of Shakespeare

But yesterday the Ford T-model might
Have stood against the world; now lies it there,
And none so poor to do it reverence.

Beauty and newness are inseparable in the case of bicycles, grocery wagons, machinery, steamboats, factory buildings, flannel shirts, shoes, typewriters, trousers, socks; with all of these articles age means ugliness. In mechanical objects there is no charm in the accumulation of years.

But cathedrals, trees, mountains, castles, manor houses, college lawns, violins, with the increase of age take on not only dignity, but beauty. A thirteenth-century cathedral is more lovely than a glossy, new church; an old tree is more beautiful than any sapling; the ancient turf in the quads of Oxford is fairer to behold than the graded front yard of a new house in South Dakota.

Why do hundreds of thousands of Americans travel gladly in Europe every summer? Mainly for one thing. It is that their Yankee eyes may have the sensation of seeing objects which the wear of centuries has made beautiful. Too many of us Americans have had the natural habit of associating beauty with newness; the new hat, the new clothes, the new motor car, the new stadium. It is worth while to discover that there are innumerable objects where age, instead of being a humiliation and a "depreciation," is not only an asset, but a thing of beauty, whose loveliness increases.

Boys and girls brought up in the slums naturally regard newness as essential to beauty and worth; the Fresh Air Fund should, if possible, take them not only to fresh woods and fields, but illuminate their minds with the sight of buildings whose age, instead of tarnishing, has made them surpassingly attractive. Henry James, in one of his novels, has a boy from the London slums entertained overnight in an English country house. This is what he saw as he looked out of his window in the early morning.

He had never in his life been in the country—the real country, as he called it; the country which was not the mere raveled fringe of London—and there entered through his open casement the breath of a world enchantingly new and, after his feverish hours, unspeakably refreshing; a sense of sweet, sunny air and mingled odors, all strangely pure and agreeable, and of a musical silence that consisted for the greater part of the voices of many birds. There were tall, quiet trees nearby and afar off and everywhere. . . . There was something in the way the gray walls rose from the green lawn that brought tears to his eyes; the spectacle of long duration unassociated with some sordid infirmity or poverty was new to him; he had lived with people among whom old age meant for the most part a grudged and degraded survival. In the favored resistance of Medley was a serenity of success, an accumulation of dignity and honor.

The Married Life of Helen and Warren

By MABEL HERBERT URNER

Creator of the "Helen and Warren" Characters.

A Pedigreed Airedale Evicted by Warren's Cherished Briar

"EXPRESS, ma'am!" Emma at the library door. "Somethin' in a crate——"

"A crate!" Helen dropped her mending. "Wait, it must be a mistake."

Darting out to the hall. A blue-bloused expressmen——

"Its a dog, ma'am," he grinned. "Lively little devil!"

Corroborarting sounds from the box. Shrill, excited barks.

"Oh, it can't be for us!"—examining the address tag.

Yes, for Mr. Warren E. Curtis—from the Kennelon Kennels!

He hadn't bought a dog—with Pussy Purr-Mew! Some one must've sent it——

Mechanically taking the proffered pencil. Signing on the indicated line.

Turning to the yelp-emitting box. A glimpse of a moist, quivering nose.

"Ain't no place here for a dog, ma'am," the maid exuding disapproval.

Ominous anecdotes of her sister's dog as they lugged the box to the pantry.

Prying it open. Spurred by the eager whimpers.

The puppy tumbling out, falling over his too-big feet. Gazing up in comic bewilderment. His brown eyes wistful, pleading.

"Oh, so glad to get out! You're a darling!" Helen cuddling him.

"Emma, get some milk."

"Sour milk's better for 'em," her surliness yielding to interest.

The puppy avidly lapping the bowl of saved-for-biscuits sour milk.

Then curling up by the cupboard. A woolly ball, one eye opened cautiously.

"He needs something to lie on. That old blanket I gave you for the ironing board. There, stay on that," a parting pat. "Emma, don't throw that box out yet."

"No'm! I hope you ain't keepin' him, ma'am."

"That's for Mr. Curtis to decide," with dignity, starting to the library.

Instantly the puppy up. Frisking clumsily about her heels.

That funny stubby tail! And such long legs—he'd grow into a huge dog.

But irresistibly cuddly now. Averting her face from his too-ardent tongue.

Again on the library rug, sorting the tangle of stockings. The puppy watching with head-on-the-side alertness.

"No, no, drop that!" rescuing a clocked chiffon.

Crouching on the floor, head between his paws. One ear cocked questioningly.

He really minded! Easy to train. A cat wouldn't obey like that.

But the stocking snagged—hopelessly!! And a good pair——

A plaintive meow! Pussy Purr-Mew perched precariously on the sofa back. Her tail inflated, her spine arched in panicky distaste.

Before the couch—the puppy! Tongue lolling, tail wagging friendliness.

But his overtures discouraged by a hostile hiss.

A flash of gray! Pussy Purr-Mew's aerial leap to the piano.

Missing it! Clawing frantically at the old brocade——

A crash! On the floor a tangle of brocade—and china!

"Oh, my lovely vase!" picking up the fragments of antique luster.

The puppy cringing. His mournful eyes following her with apologetic guilt.

"Yes, I know you didn't mean to. But I can't have you with Pussy Purr-Mew!"

His tail drooping dejection as she carried him out.

"Emma, keep him here till Mr. Curtis comes. He's broken that piano vase. Well, it can't be helped now," cutting short her I-told-you-so gloating.

Pussy Purr-Mew not to be found. Outraged hiding from this enemy intruder.

How could they manage with her—if Warren insisted on keeping it?

A restless afternoon. Anxious suspense till he came.

Fortunately early. Breezing in before 6.

"Hello, Kitten!" his exuberant greeting. "Did he come? Well, trot him out! Great pup, isn't he? Pedigreed Airedale. Worth a Hundred bucks."

"A hundred dollars?" incredulously. "Dear, you didn't——"

"Now pipe down. Ellison sent him. That contract I helped him with—and wouldn't take anything. Where'd you park him?"

"In the pantry. He was terrifying Pussy Purr-Mew."

"Huh, she'd better get used to him. She's ruled this roost long enough!" striding pantryward.

The puppy bounding out—sensing a rescuer. Jumping up on Warren. Licking his face, chewing at his hands.

"Hello, you little scamp!" beaming. "Fine dog, all right. Full of pep. Now, we're not cooping him up in there. I'll start training him tonight."

Helen discreetly silent. Half through dinner before she ventured a casual, "Dear, don't Airedale's grow up awfully big? And in an apartment——"

"Huh, any man's dog's a good size. Want me to swap him for a waddly little Peke?" carving another slice of roast. "Now, when it comes to dogs, I do the picking! You stick to your tabbies."

Not answering. Nervous apprehension. That dog unwatched in the library——

But Warren for once hurrying his dinner. Small-boy eagerness for a new toy.

"Come on, let's get acquainted with our pup," throwing down his napkin.

In the library—a ludicrous tableau!

Pussy Purr-Mew on the high bookcase. Glaring down at the prancing puppy with out-of-reach disdain.

"Oh, he frightens her so! Dear, look at her eyes!"

"Huh, she could settle him with one swat—if she wasn't such a coward. He just wants to play. But that pampered pet of yours—afraid of her shadow!"

The puppy still whining up at the haughty Persian. Eager to make friends.

"Let that spineless meow alone—not in your class. Come here!" whistled Warren. "What'll we call him? Something snappy. How about Sport?"

"Why, that's all right," playing up to his enthusiasm. "But rather old."

"Spot, Trip, Bounce? Here, let go my shoe lace! Lively enough. Buster?"

"Oh, dear, anything but Buster!"

"Well, we'll leave it Sport till we think up something better. Here, Sport! Now, you're going to learn to let that cat alone."

"Dear, you really think we can keep him? In an apartment——"

"Why not?" bristling. "Other people have dogs in apartments."

"Then you'll get up early every morning and take him out?" innocently.

"Not much! Emma can after breakfast. What's that? She will if I say so!"

Helen straightening the rumpled rugs. Unable to conceal her disapproval.

"Thought you were so keen about animals?" he snorted. "Always pickin' up stray mutts! Now we've a real dog—you're putting up a kick!"

"Dear, a valuable dog can always get a home. But those poor little mongrels—— Oh, if we must have a dog——I'd rather take one of those strays!"

"Too darn quixotic for me! Now I cough up for your animal charities, but if we have a dog—by George, we'll have a good one! And this pup's got a pedigree a yard long. Haven't you, Sport? Hello, where is he?"

The puppy vanished. Pussy Purr-Mew still crouched on the bookcase. Slit-eyed alertness for her tormentor's return.

"I hope he's not into any mischief!"

"Now you sit down and leave him alone. Let him nose around—get used to his home. Where's the rest of this?"

Handing him the paper. Absently scanning a magazine.

Of course she'd have to exercise it! Hard enough to keep a maid——

Padding feet. The puppy at the door—with something dark and shapeless.

"What you got there, Sport? Bring it here."

Tail-wagging obedience. Trotting up. Laying it proudly at Warren's feet.

"What the devil!" seizing it. "Golly, my hat—all chewed up!"

"Not the velour you got in Vienna! Oh, it's ruined!"

"Well, he doesn't know any better—will when he's trained. Guess I can blow myself to another lid——Great Guns, did I leave my pipe out there?"

"I'll see, dear," dashing to the hall.

Her old velvet table-strip pulled to the floor With it the ash tray—and Warren's favorite English pipe——Yes, broken!

That amber-stemmed briar—his most treasured possession!

"What's keeping you?" a growl from the door. "He didn't get that pipe?"

"Dear, maybe it can be fixed——"

"Fixed!" he thundered, snatching it. "Smashed the stem! Never fix that. How in blazes'd he get it?"

"Pulled off with this," shaking the clinging ashes from the antique velvet.

"Huh, your old rags droopin' all over the place! Where's that hound?" savagely stalking back to the library. "I'll teach him to break my pipes!"

"Dear, you can't—you're not going to whip him?" quiveringly.

"Now, you keep out of this. Here, Sport!" he bellowed. "Come here, I say!"

But the puppy scurrying off. Cringing under the couch. Plaintive whimpers.

"Best I ever had—took me two years to color," Warren lugubriously examining his split pipe. "That little cur!"

Now—the propitious moment!

"And, dear, you can add a two-fifty pair of stockings, that antique vase I brought from Edinburgh—and your fifteen-dollar hat"

"Expensive day!" pacing up and down. "That other stuff doesn't matter—can all be replaced. But my pipe!" grimly. "Well, that settles it."

"Settles what, dear?" casually adjusting the lamp shade.

"I could train him all right—if I were home all day——"

"And he is so cunning! In a way, I'd love to keep him," trying the inspire-his-contrariness method.

"Huh, you'd be sure to spoil him. And Carrie's been wanting an Airedale for Bobbie. A boy ought to grow up with a dog——"

A perfect solution! But let him think he was deciding himself. No after-reproaches.

"And their big place in the country," persisted Warren. "Better for the pup, too—plenty of room to run."

"Well, of course, he's your dog. And I know they'll be good to him," achieving a have-my-doubts tone. "But still——"

"Carrie'll treat him right!" instantly defensive. "You're not the only one keen about animals. I'll ring her up now. She's driving in tomorrow—get him then."

A glance at the feline-topped bookcase as he strode to the telephone.

"Guess we'll rub along with old Pussy Purr-Mew. May not have much brains—but sense enough to lay off my things. How about it, Pussums? Got a yellow streak as long as your tail—but at least can gum-shoe 'round without wreckin' the place!"

OUR ANNUAL A. E. F.—By MAUDE PARKER

Even Paris Has Its Disillusionments, and Here You May Recognize a Few of Them.

TWENTY-SEVEN thousand returning American tourists will be landed in New York this week. They will disperse to their various homes in these United States to comfortable suburban houses, restricted flats in crowded cities, luxurious country estates, and lonely farms.

In May, this veritable army of tourists occupied Paris. All summer the French capital has been held by 300,000 invaders as securely as if it were indeed an American possession. That this capture is effected not by arms, but by dollars does not alter the fact that the annual summer noncombatant A. E. F. has produced startling changes in the aspect of the city where it has been quartered. Paris has become America's glorified Coney Island.

Now, Coney Island and similar amusement parks are delightful recreation for an occasional summer evening. They provide gayety and childlike fun at a comparatively low cost. But why thousands of otherwise sane adults should spend large sums of money in procuring steamship passage to Europe, hiring costly rooms in hotels, and put up with inconveniences of service and plumbing in order to have months of the sort of second-rate pleasure, which is designed for no more than a few hours' entertainment at most, remains a mystery.

* * * *

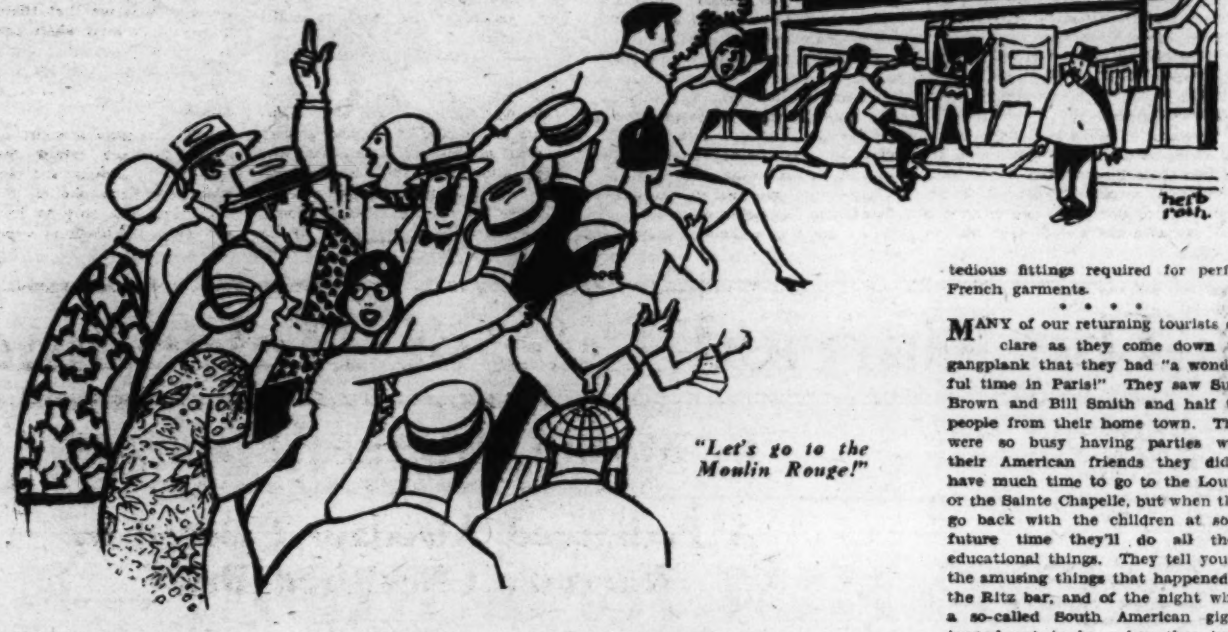
BUT before the boat-train has come within sight of the Eiffel Tower, a party is eagerly planned for that very evening—a party symbolic of the least individual attractions Paris has to offer.

First there will be a dinner, with too much food, preceded by too many cocktails at an American bar. And afterward the usual routine in and out of cafes on Montmartre, in the course of which some one will persuade a "pathetic" French employe at Zelli's, after a quart of champagne, on the sale of which she gets a percentage, to confide "the story of her life"—in English.

This will probably be the occasion on which it is decided to see all there is of the night life.

Night life in Paris! a phrase to be uttered with a mental licking of the lips and a sly smile of anticipation. And what it is apt to amount to with the average tourist is a good deal of dancing to American orchestras, punctuated by more drinking in American bars, a final breakfast of scrambled eggs and bacon, American style, and a weary homecoming at 6 in the morning, to demand your key from a bored concierge, who thanks you in English for your over-large tip, and only by the expression of superiority in his sleepy eyes betrays his nationality.

And those evenings on the Left Bank!



"Let's go to the Moulin Rouge!"

The dinner at the Tour d'Argent, where duck is ordered because each one is ostentatiously numbered, but is not considered half as edible as the really well cooked ducks prepared in your own kitchen. The surroundings, however, are invariably considered "quaint" or "cute."

* * *

Then there are the much-touted cabarets—the Dome, the Rotonde, the new Cupole, with its provision for literally thousands of Americans who go to see "the wicked life of the Latin quarter," and for whose delectation there is provided a soda fountain!

The theater! Those shows you saw last year or the year before in America, but which nevertheless are the most popular places during the dog days.

And the colored performers at night clubs! And the inevitable Southerner who protests against their familiarity.

The voice heard in the courtyard of your hotel when you're trying to sleep off the effects of the onion soup—it couldn't be the champagne, because champagne is nourishing and onion soup is a silly French invention—the voice that says: "Wafter, can't you get me some decent American coffee, and bring me some cream with it? Why, they'd be ashamed to serve stuff as bad as this and with only milk in our hotel in Peoria!"

AND each individual's excuse for these absurdities adds to the horror. Almost every tourist says, "Isn't it terrible here in the summer? You don't see any one but Americans."

Then in appreciation of his sentiment you are ready to forgive him his platitude, until he adds, "Why don't you lunch with me? I've discovered a little place where you can get fried chicken, Maryland style, and hot biscuits." And this in a country whose very name is synonymous with the best cooking in the world!

One's irritation extends gradually beyond the man who orders in his native tongue in restaurants whose specialties are internationally famous, to the maitres d'hotel and sommeliers, who, speaking recently acquired but intelligible English, serve, with no more than a shrug of the shoulders by way of protest, incongruous food and drinks, at absurdly high prices.

Wives and daughters, who go into Paris department stores to try and get for less money exactly the kind of articles they can buy in department stores when they get home, are apt to be disappointed. And their belief that the really first-rate places sell all their models to American manufacturers before showing them to private plants is not true. The answer is that to extract the best from these dressmakers requires as much time and taste in selection as a well-dressed French woman gives to the subject. Most tourists are unwilling to spend the necessary hours scrutinizing various collections of gowns before making a choice and absolutely refuse to undertake the tedious fittings required for perfect French garments.

* * * *

MANY of our returning tourists declare as they come down the gangplank that they had "a wonderful time in Paris!" They saw Susie Brown and Bill Smith and half the people from their home town. They were so busy having parties with their American friends they didn't have much time to go to the Louvre or the Sainte Chapelle, but when they go back with the children at some future time they'll do all those educational things. They tell you of the amusing things that happened at the Ritz bar, and of the night when a so-called South American gigolo turned out to be a boy they knew from Atlanta!

Some of the more outdoor inclined will declare that the most enjoyable part of their trip was the golf they played at an American country club near Paris. Others will rejoice because they've bought all their Christmas presents—"and at half the price the same things would have cost at home."

* * * *

A MINORITY will be fired with desire to go back at a time when several hundred thousand golf-playing, party-loving Susie Browns and Bill Smiths are not there, and the French capital is again inhabited by Parisians. They picture Paris as a proud and beautiful woman, who has been forced to entertain unappreciative guests, drawing a sigh of relief when the last crowded ship has sailed in the autumn. Then she will smile in contentment. Her home is her own again, for the enjoyment of her true friends, who seek from her not those meretricious manifestations which are common to all big cities, but those who love her for the unique qualities which set her apart from all other capitals of the world.

NOBODY'S BUSINESS

er, so I do not think it will prosper, if indeed it should reopen at all.

The revival in Illinois, after a lapse of 26 years, began in defiance of the law, but was carried on with a happy minimum of larceny, so the interest of the customers was aroused while the resentment of the reformers wasted itself in futile complaints. When the customers were stimulated, some of the influential citizens decided that horse racing was not necessarily vicious, and the legislature legalized the game once more, creating the greatest racing center in America in Chicago.

At the close of the war prize fighting was illegal in New York, Illinois and several other States which now permit fighting, waltzing and driving. Wisconsin and Minnesota had boxing commissions and Philadelphia tolerated six-rounders. New Jersey stood for illegal eight-round bouts, and there were minor centers where the boys could fight quietly at various distances up to ten rounds, generally under police supervision or the surveillance of local commissions composed of poolroom politicians.

There had been much boxing in the Army and Navy, however, and by dint of some flag waving, the promoters lobbied through a fifteen-round decision law in New York. New Jersey also appointed a commission and raised the limit first to ten and then to fifteen rounds, and Pennsylvania's limit was increased to ten. The no-decision territory shrunk so that now there are few boxing towns in which decisions still are forbidden. In some States, the law gives the American Legion or the National Guard technical status as fight promoters. As a rule these bouts are run by professional promoters and the business in most instances reflects no credit on the Legion or the National Guard. Illinois sanctioned ten-round fights under a commission, after a long and by no means reassuring spell of illegal prize fighting, intended to demonstrate that the game was now noble and sanitary.

The expansion of the horse racing territory has been seriously embarrassed at all times by the racketeers who conduct greyhound tracks with pari-mutuel gambling. This is a larcenous activity, and the high rate of profit enables the promoters to lobby aggressively in the legislatures when horse racing bills are up for consideration. The Florida legislature, for instance, lost any sympathy that it may have felt for Miami's petition when it was found impossible to discriminate between horses and dogs. A dog racing plant is inexpensive, and an enterprising gang of racketeers can clean up and move out with a profit, abandoning the plant if necessary after one season.

The New Jersey law against horse racing is the strongest in the country and was used as a model for similar statutes in several other States. Several years ago Tex Rickard went to Trenton with an attorney to study the law, hoping to find some flaw. He wanted to run a dog track. Half way through their study Tex put on his hat, lit a cigar and said to his lawyer: "Let's get the next train back to New York. That law has more teeth than a shark."

Roulette, faro, and craps are common pleasures of the sporty summer and winter resorts North and South and of big cities in the North, New York, strangely enough, excepted, although gambling houses are accessible in the suburbs. Altogether, the armies of folly have advanced to a great depth on a long front. Prohibition, the reformers' Verdun, hold out, but the nut cracker has broken the line on both sides in a kind of enveloping movement.

LITTLE STORIES OF GREAT EVENTS

COMING OF THE PILGRIMS

By RAMON COFFMAN, Author of "Uncle Ray's Corner."

The drama of the Pilgrims is set forth in this article, and the reader is carried along with the adventurers who established the first successful colony in New England. A valuable historical scrapbook may be compiled by clipping Ramon Coffman's articles each week.

"WILL it come, will it come?" Anxiously they wait, anxiously they wonder whether the Dutch ship will arrive and take them from their native land, across the North Sea to the hospitable coast of the Netherlands. In England they have found the path hard; they feel that they have been persecuted for their religious views, and that to obtain freedom they must go abroad.

At least the older ones among these Separatists are thinking such thoughts. The children are reflecting on the excitement of the prospective sea voyage. They, too, want the ship to come; but it is because they expect the thrill of riding the waves.

Two hundred men, women and children are gathered in a barge laden with household goods. The barge has grounded in the low tide. It is stuck in the mud, as we may say; but the ship will send forth rowboats to take all on board—provided that all goes well.

It comes into sight, the welcome ship. The men are being taken aboard first—but they have hardly reached the ship when horsemen appear on the horizon, galloping madly toward the barge.

The Dutch ship takes warning, and sail is set.

Left behind are terrified women and children, with a bare handful of men. Yes, the horsemen are soldiers. They round up the Separatists and hale them before a court of law.

"Where are your homes?" asks the judge.

"We have no homes," is the reply. "We have sold our houses and were preparing to go to the Netherlands."

This presents a knotty problem, for the women and children would obviously become public charges before long. Better to let them go their way.

Another ship sails to Holland and the families are reunited. These are thrifty people, and they make their way in the land which provides them with shelter.

The years pass, peacefully enough, but at length a spirit of restlessness grows. Parents find that their children are adopting the Dutch language, and some of the older boys are running away to become sailors. There is also the haunting fear that Spain will invade and conquer the Netherlands, destroying religious freedom.

Much argument ensues. The bolder spirits say, "Let us move to the New World."

Guiana, where Englishmen have obtained a certain power, is proposed; but it is declined—for it is a place of fever, and besides it might easily be attacked by the Spaniards.

Letters pass to England and it is learned that an English company is willing to finance an expendition to the North American coast, provided that the profits of the colony to be established shall be shared. This project wins the day, and there is bustle of preparation.

After making their way to Southampton, the Separatists—or the "Pilgrims" as they are to be better known—board two ships. One vessel proves leaky and has to turn back, but most of the passengers are transfered to the other, the Mayflower.

Crowded and cramped, the Pilgrims dare the ocean. Many emotions play in their breasts as they cross the sea—fear of the stormy waters, apprehension of the savages they expect to encounter, eagerness to touch the soil of land where they are promised freedom to practice their religion.

"A general landing is made and all have the opportunity to touch the soil."

The worst storm occurs in mid-ocean, and the ship's main beam is forced out of place. There is talk of turning back, but it would be as dangerous to do that as to sail onward. After much trobule the beams is replaced and fastened tightly. Sail on, now, sail on!

Two months and five days pass, and then the shore is seen—the shore of Cape Cod. It looks rather barren and forbidding, but that is to be expected with winter close at hand. A party led by Miles Standish, goes ashore, and explores the land. A small sailboat is lowered from the Mayflower and is used for explorations along the coast.

At length a place is located which will serve as a harbor, and thither the Mayflower is steered. On a day in late December, 1620, anchor is cast in Plymouth harbor.

A general landing is made, and all have the opportunity to touch the soil. It is a drizzly day, but the hearts of the Pilgrims do not partake of the gloom of the sky. Energetically they start to fell trees to make cabins for themselves.

Wintry months are ahead, months which will bring sickness and death to many; but the colony is destined to survive and to be more sturdy than the Jamestown colony established thirteen years earlier, far down along the coast.

The "savages" are to prove friends, very human and kindly. Chief Massasoit, moved by pity perhaps, is to become a firm protector of the little band; little dreaming that these people are the forerunners of a mighty invasion which will sweep aside the Indians, little knowing that his own grandson will one day be sold into slavery by the whites.

The Pilgrims hold their religious meetings, full of thankfulness that they can worship as they please. Yet in the strange maze which human nature finds itself capable of entering, these people who have struggled so valiantly to establish their own right to religious choice, are to join with other New England colonists in denying freedom to Quakers and Catholics. It is a topsy-turvy world, perchance, but the Pilgrims think not of that. Their hands are turned to tilling the soil; their eyes wander toward the meeting house; their hearts are stanch in the new adventure.

gone about five miles. A mile or two more and again the driver broke the silence.

"Maybe we oughta give him a break with a gun, just to see how much guts he's really got."

"There's no break to be given out tonight, ruled the gang chief. "The only break he'll get will be a bullet."

* * * *

"CAN I have a cigarette?"

As he spoke, Tom, from habit, reached for his pocket. The gang chief whipped the butt of his revolver against the captive's face, knocking him back against the seat at the same time warning him to keep his hands in plain sight.

They put into Moonachie road. Tom put his hand to his face and felt moisture and blood. His features were swollen worse than they ever had been from his ring battles. These dirty cowardly rats! What he could do to them if they weren't armed! It was like them to catch him alone this way. They never did fight like men * * * well, wait!

A half mile farther and one of the gangsters pushed a cigarette into Tom's fingers and lighted it. Tom nodded his thanks; he smoked avidly, taking long puffs. How good it was—the smoke! With morbid interest the gangster watched him, and when he had done gave him another.

"Say, tough guy, how'd you like to run for your life while we shoot at you?" he asked.

The driver slowed down the car.

"Aw, give me a break—any kind you like," Tom answered, and he laughed.

His laugh sounded odd to him, high pitched, hysterical. He musn't get to begging, whining before these pigs. That was the last thing he must do.

"What're you laughing at?"

The gang chief threw himself upon Tom and beat him on the face and head with his gun. Tom dodged, covered, cowered, but he was badly cut and stung. His mouth still bled and his right eye was closed tight. But the stoic fortitude he had learned in the ring stood him in good stead. God, if ever he got a chance at these guys!

* * * *

HAVING gone about a quarter mile up the road, the car was swung around and driven back some little distance. It slowed down and stopped. The driver faced the chief.

"Let's get it over with," he said.

The suggestion met with every one's approval. Even Tom, sure they wouldn't have the courage to shoot him, wanted to get it over with. Three of the gangsters jumped out. One stood at the door, keeping Tom covered, while the others reached in and grabbed him by the collar. He tried to step out himself, but they dragged him roughly. Stumbling, striving to keep his feet, he was spun around and thrown against a telegraph pole. He leaned against it, looking at them out of his uninjured eye. Damn 'em for cowards and bums! . . . They'd probably tell him to run, and fire in the air and leave him to walk home. . . .

He looked over the ground. Acres of flat, weedy land and scrub farms. Clumps of trees and houses, the nearest 200 yards away. Far to the left, the sky reflected the glow of the lights of New York City. The heat hung over the still marsh like an invisible mist. On the hill to the right Tom saw the lights of a village. It couldn't be far . . .

"What leg was Smith shot in?"

It was the gang chief who spoke. He stood directly in front of Tom, gat in hand. The other gangsters watched.

"The right," one answered.

"Pull up your right pants leg."

Tom did so.

"Put up your leg!"

Tom raised his right leg, the heel about a foot from the ground. They let him stand so for minutes—until the muscles hurt. But he'd show 'em they couldn't break his nerve; they couldn't make him turn yellow. They wouldn't dare shoot him . . .

"What have you got to say before you die?"

"Nothing!"

Holding his revolver within a foot of his leg, the gang chief fired. The bullet entered the front thigh and came out behind the knee. A blow and a stab of fire. The marsh re-echoed with the shot; seemed to reel. Tom clung to the post behind him to keep from falling. He had been shot. It didn't seem possible; possible that they would do this. What if they were really going to kill him! But no, they were going to shoot him where Smith was shot, and leave him. Well, they had done it . . . damn 'em. He'd rush them anyway. But there were three, three ready guns. The bullet hadn't hit the bone—he'd get over this.

Leaning against the pole, Tom did so. For the first time he really believed they were going to bump him off! They were going to shoot him down with bullets in the legs and then as he lay on the ground give him the finisher. They were. They were. The ides seemed to pound in his brain, while he strove with his one seeing eye to keep the gang chief's revolver held before him, in sight! He thought the hand trembled; the dirty coward!

Three times the gun barked, four, five. Two stabs of flame went through the left leg. He kept telling himself he must not fall. He must not fall! He would take his finisher standing up. But struggle as he would, he began to slip down against the pole. His mind swam dizzily. He could not see. They had the wrong man, damn 'em, but it was too late now. His dead mother had warned him; his father had begged him to stay in school, his wise old father who worked day after day and said so little, . . . He could see their faces. . . . His brothers and sisters . . . Why had he ever gotten in that damned car? . . . What would they say?

The end! Down, down, Tom slid clinging to the pole. Already he could feel the gun against his temple. The finisher!

But it did not come. Concertedly the gangsters ran back and made for the car. Had they been scared off? Tom wondered. He heard nothing that could have stampeded them. The three henchmen tumbled into the automobile. On their heels, at the door, the gang chief paused before he too leaped in.

"So long," he said, brusquely, and the black car sped down the road.

* * * *

THREE telegraph poles down Moonachie road automobiles passed on Paterson plank road, a main highway of the marsh. Tom faced like a moth toward those will o' the wisp lights. He got himself to the fence back of the pole against which they had stood him for the killing. A few feet he dragged along, then the burden of weakness pushed him down on his face. Now he crawled toward the highway, hoping to flag a passing car. For days thereafter, the police testify, there was a streak of blood on the ground to mark his path.

Four cars approached, one after the other. Each time the lights moved up Tom cried and waved his handkerchief. Each driver slowed down, took a good look at him and hurried away.

But he was, it appears, before a farmer's gate. Roused by his cries, the farmer came out with a shotgun and stood over him. A fifth motorist, seeing the embattled farmer, stopped. On the ground, the stricken Tom peered at these two denizens of the marsh and begged for a glass of water! The farmer brought it. Tom drank, and it made him deathly ill. Another motorist pulled up.

"Why the hell don't you get him to a hospital?" this man demanded.

So they carried Tom 4 miles to Hackensack Hospital, without thought to stanch the flow of blood from his wounds. At 2 o'clock Tom lay on a hospital cot, near death, but conscious. At six that morning a blood transfusion was accomplished. The "tough guy" recovered so markedly that by noon it was agreed that with care and rest he would pull through.

Almost continually detectives questioned Tom. Who shot him, and why? Tom talked—told everything, except the names of his assailants. He would not squeal. Meantime, word went around Hoboken's underworld that the gang chief and his henchmen had taken Tom Bertoni for a ride, and before dawn police had the names. The alarm went out. Next afternoon Patrolman Cramer arrested the gangster chief.

The detectives kept after Tom. He made several statements, and in trying to keep from squealing he laid himself open to perjury. The Bergen County prosecutor gave him his choice: he could testify against the gangster chief, or he could face trial and prison himself. Bertoni did testify against the gangster chief, who, by the way, got seven years at hard labor—but he did it reluctantly. In fact, he told only as much as they could worm out of him by the most searching cross-examination.

* * * *

"BUT I can't see why you didn't do all you could to help convict him," I said to Tom when he had done. "I would have. I'd have wanted to see him in for life."

"It was my friends," said Tom, quietly. "They didn't want to see him go to jail."

I think I understand. It is very hard to get a man who is in jail, but simple and very easy to take a free man for a ride. Perhaps over the very route Tom traversed last June.

How's Your Inferiority Complex?

The Universal Inheritance, and What to Do With It.

By JAMES OPPENHEIM.

WHAT is it that every one has and nobody likes? Answer: Inferiority complex. The first known recorded cases of this malign human infirmity are those of Adam and Eve at the time they clothed themselves in fig-leaves because they were naked. That is to say, they felt that they had a shame to hide, something to cover up. This shame, this sense of nakedness, is the inferiority complex.

Say a man has had a rough bringing up, like Jack London. He has been a powerful fighter, a seaman, an adventurer. But he has never been intimate with refined and cultured people. One day he is invited to have dinner at the home of a lawyer. He enters a room that has delicate furniture, fine paintings, a piano, a rug on a hardwood floor. He feels like a bull in a china shop. At table he has to watch the others. Which fork to use? Which spoon? Where do you put your napkin? He feels that every one can see he is an unmannered lout. He feels exposed. He feels naked. That is to say, he has a marked feeling of inferiority, which he keeps trying to hide with the fig-leaves of imitating the manners of the others.

And this is no exceptional case. The reader will readily recognize something similar in himself (or herself). "I shrank within myself." "I felt so little I wanted the earth to open and swallow me up." And why do we feel like this?

A woman gets a new outfit of clothes, something very becoming, and prances up the avenue like a queen. But let her, in an Easter parade, be dressed shoddily, knowing perhaps that the clothes she is wearing were cast-off garments, that her shoes have holes in them, her stockings runs, and she will feel little, ashamed, like wanting to hide herself. She is naked. People can see that she is nothing. She feels inferior.

• • • •

IF WE examine the matter closely we will see that what we lack and others have is the cause of this feeling. The poor man usually feels inferior before the rich, the ignorant before the learned, the employe before the boss, the boss before the man who really knows how to play golf, the criminal before the good man, the poorly clothed before the well-dressed, the child before the adult. And the cause of it is anything that puts us at a disadvantage before others.

For instance, a boy I knew well was a blue baby—that is, he was such a weakling that he almost perished before he was nine months old. As a lad he was, as his teacher said, "lacking in coordination." His body jerked this way and that; he was afraid of his shadow; he was scary as a girl. He couldn't help any of these things. It was just his inborn nervous system. No amount of sympathy or advice could help him. And naturally he wasn't a boy among the boys, and knew it. He admitted he was a weakling. Ordinary boys would pitch him into the swimming pool, where he almost drowned. They could torment him with impunity. He simply felt that he wasn't meant for this world; he was no good. In short, he developed an unusually lusty inferiority complex.

But here comes the strange mystery of things. It has often been said that pain is as necessary to life as pleasure. Without pain we'd still be swimming in the mud of the dawn of time. Pain spurs us. It drives us to invention. And it is usually the weak who invent. Doubtless some physical weakling of the tribe, who stood no chance against the brutal war clubs of the enemy in a hand-to-hand encounter, invented the bow and arrow so that he could stand at a distance and by cunning put himself on an equality with the strongest of his enemies. A deaf man invented the phonograph. Many a sick man has made discoveries in medicine.

And so nature seems to work with all human deficiencies. The feeling of inferiority, if it is strong enough, creates a reaction in the opposite direction. The psychologist Adler calls this the will to power. Here's an instance of it:

A bully on a gang puts down a little fellow. The little fellow puts up a strong fight; but no use. He's licked to a finish. He gets up finally in a rage. "You big bully," he roars, "I'm going to train to be a prize fighter, and when I'm twenty-one I'll lick you and your whole blame gang single-handed." He doesn't make up his mind merely to be as good as the bully who put him down; he's going to be a superman and lick a gang. And from now on a burning ambition will rankle in him. He'll concentrate on fighting, on building biceps, on taking punishment, on learning boxing. He'll run, row, suffer. He may in time become a great prize fighter. His will to power, awakened by his inferiority feeling, will carry him to the heights.

• • • •

THE same was true of the weakling boy who had been a blue baby and whose school fellows tormented him. When it came time to go to high school he consulted his father. He didn't want to go. The boys would torment him. And unless he engaged in sport activities he wouldn't make a showing at all. But how engage in the activities? With his weak body he was not fit for any sport.

"Son," said his father, "if you can't meet the fellows with your body, meet them with your mind. You've got an unusual mind and it has creative power. Aim to be editor of the school paper, and write the school play when you graduate."

He became ambitious at once to conquer the school with his pen. He worked feverishly. He had stories accepted by the school papers; he had playlets accepted by the dramatic society. He became known and admired. He was graduated with flying colors an honor student, editor of the school paper, and his play went over with a bang. So great was his success that he launched into a career of writing, where he speedily went to the top.

If we look at civilization we see that it is a series of inventions, whether physical, such as telephone, steam engine, &c., or new ideas, such as democracy, new knowledge &c.; and if we look behind to the men who originated these things we will usually find a person who couldn't fit in, who felt inferior to his fellows and had to invent a way to make a place for himself. The discoverer of the theory of evolution, Darwin, was considered stupid at school. He developed an idea that has shaken the world. Roosevelt was a weakling as a boy, and became a sort of superman of strength and a great President. Dostoievsky, one of the greatest of novelists, was an epileptic.

Weakness, however, does not always lead to superiority. Otherwise we would not have insane asylums, hospitals, prisons and almshouses.

• • • •

IF YOU who read this are a woman, instead of a man, you may well ask where you fit into the picture. Well, with woman the game is usually a different one. Relatively few women aim at greatness of achievement in art, science, politics, business with the singleness of purpose which distinguishes men. Women are more interested in human relationships than they are in making history.

To win and hold men, to dominate children, to have the finest clothes, the richest gems, the most startling beauty, to be more charming than other women, to be the power behind the throne rather than on it—such are the ambitions that bestir women. How many men have said: "If it hadn't been for the ambition of my wife I'd never have succeeded."

The picture I see is of a girl in school who is an ugly duckling and is neglected by the boys and sneered at by the girls. She becomes ruthlessly ambitious. Iron enters her. She'll show them! When she is old enough she makes the acquaintance of a scene shifter with a movie concern. He'll do. She makes him fall in love with her. He gets her introduced on the set. She angles for an electrician. He falls for her. She discards the scene shifter. And so she plays her game to the top. Love connotes sacrifice and service, but here it is used as a means of gaining power.

But we all know the ugly side of this inferiority business. What is jealousy? This painful and destructive feeling is mainly compounded of the feeling of inferiority. I have met women who declared they were not jealous, but when the test came they fell down.

A woman's husband leaves her for another woman. How can the wife feel anything but a futile weakness, a helplessness, a sense of being not beautiful enough, not seductive enough to held her man against her rival? How can she feel anything but inferior? And out of this feeling leaps will to power. She will destroy her rival; she will get her man back at any cost; she will cover her with shame before her neighbors. This is why jealousy gives rise so often to destructive fury, to dangerous anger and sometimes to crime.

• • • •

WELL, we have this inferiority complex, all of us, whether it's a little thing or a big. What are we going to do about it? The best thing to do is to face it. Think over your past, especially your childhood, and see what your burning troubles were then. Was a sister or a brother the favorite, at your expense? Did you dress poorly, more poorly than your school fellows? Were you an object of ridicule for any reason? Were you sickly, or a cripple, or a stammerer? Were you petted too much and spoiled, so that the world has seemed too harsh for you ever since? Whatever it is, if you find it say to it:

"Welcome home. I know you for what you are—a childish thing. Every one else has his weakness. I have mine."

Often the worst is over if one accepts what one is.

NEATNESS IS A SURE MEASURE OF SELF RESPECT

Too Many of Our Contributors Reveal Telltale Lack of Care

Dear Post Boys and Girls:

Evidently many of you have a lot of self-respect. For that the editor is very proud of you. It is possible to read much about contributors in the stories, poems and drawings submitted by them. Not always the products of genius or even the most cleverly written or drawn entries disclose self-respect. Sometimes a boy or girl contributor will have a really clever idea. But he writes it so carelessly or pays so little attention to detail that its value is seriously diminished.

We can tell as soon as the envelopes sent in by The Junior Post members are open whether or not they come from a self-respecting boy or girl. If the paper is crumpled or not quite clean, with many erasures, blots of ink and the writing not carefully done, it is plain the sender lacked essentials of self-respect. Your contributions come not only to the eye of the editor but the printers and the men who make up the paper. Some of them will notice if the boy or girl sends in what newspaper men call "clean copy." Of course, some of the contributions can not be used at all, they are so carelessly written and on both sides of the paper. If there is a choice between printing two stories, it is only fair to print the neatest one and that which shows the most careful thought and painstaking preparation.

The rate of self-respect among our boys and girls is very high, indeed, not only in their work for The Junior Post, but in their daily life. Probably in no city in the world do we pass many boys and girls with well-washed faces and hands and nicely combed hair as in Washington.

Neatness, not only in the preparation of school papers and personal appearance, but of your desk and manner of doing your share toward keeping your school rooms in order are essentials of good scholarship. You will have more respect for yourself and other pupils will have more respect for you if your desk and belongings are neat and carefully arranged.

One of the characteristics of a good citizen is to assist in keeping the city clean and in order. The boy or girl who does not hesitate to throw trash about the streets may be found to be untidy in the home and the classroom. Therefore he or she may most justly forfeit some of the respect due to every individual who tries to earn it.

Carelessness and being in too much of a hurry is revealed in some of the best stories sent to The Junior Post. One boy actually was in such a rush that he not only spoke of our dignified little paper as the "Jr. Post" but as the "Jr. Pi." Those who want to achieve elegance and finish in writing will not use abbreviations which are acceptable in the business and commercial world but have no place n literature. If you will read any newspaper, including The Junior Post, carefully you will notice that we never use "&" for "and" and "Chas." for "Charles" or "Wash." for "Washington." Nor do we run the last words of sentences up one side of a paper. Just think how embarrassed you would be if we printed contributions with abbreviations and short cuts and carelessly written and spelled! Of course, we would not. When you see some boy or girl wearing a Junior Post writer's pin you may be sure that his or her work has been without blots, blemishes and too many abbreviations.

This week we received many really excellent and clever drawings in lead pencil. Had they been in ink we might have printed some of them.

The Tiny Tots do very well in drawing and we would like to use some of their clever little outlines. But they do not often draw them in black ink, so we can not use them.

Nosedive Jimmy.

One day way up in the clouds there was a speedy little Neuport going its fastest and at the same time going through its stunts.

The Neuport was 10,000 feet up, which was very lucky for the pilot.

The pilot's name was Jimmy Foster. Jimmy was enjoying himself to his heart's content when all of a sudden his plane went into a nosedive.

Jimmy worked frantically at the controls but he kept going down and down until he was 2,000 feet from the ground. All of a sudden the engines started again and then Jimmy started climbing again. After climbing 8,000 feet Jimmy went along on a straight course until he hit an air pocket and Jimmy went into a nosedive again, this time Jimmy crashed.

Jimmy had a few cuts but that was all. Thus Jimmy got the name of Nosedive Jimmy.

Spreading Happiness.

Beth was walking down the street. She had on a new dress, slippers and a pretty new hat. In her hand was a new purse with a new $5 bill in it.

"I wonder what I'll buy," thought Beth.

"Today is my birthday and mother said I could do what I pleased with my money."

As Beth walked along she saw a little girl about her own age sitting on the curb. Her dress was torn and her feet were bare, but she was clean. She looked up at Beth and smiled. Beth saw she had been crying. In her hand she had a bunch of paper flowers.

"How do you do," said Beth.

"How do," said the little girl.

"What is your name, and did you make these pretty flowers?" said Beth.

"Ma makes 'em and I sell 'em. I sold half and Ted, the bad boy that sells papers, took my money. My name is Geraldine, but they all call me Jerry. We live on River road, Ma and Tommy and Sue," said Jerry. "Pa's dead and ma has only us three. Tom and Sue are twins. Would you like to see my folks?" said Jerry.

"Yes, indeed," said Beth, "but first let's stop in the store and take them home something nice."

Beth took hold of Jerry's hand and went into the store.

"Good morning, Miss Gill," said Mr. Dean, "what can I do for you?"

"I want a basket first and then I'll tell you what to put in it," said Beth. "Let's see, milk, bread, cakes and all that will make a fine pot of soup. I guess you had better put in some nice apples," said Beth. "That will be all today. How much, Mr. Dean?"

"Three dollars and seventy five cents, Miss Gill."

Beth put the change in her purse and she and Jerry left the store with a smile on their faces. They took the car and were soon at Mrs. Reed's house.

It was a queer little house. The twins were in the yard. Mrs. Reed was mending Tommy's pants. She looked up and smiled at Beth.

"Mother, this is Beth Gill and a dear, kind girl. Just look what she has bought," said Jerry.

Beth opened her purse and gave her dollar to Mrs. Reed.

"Tomorrow I'll come and bring some things for the children."

Mrs. Reed thanked her. Mr. Reed was killed on the train and she had struggled to keep her children.

Beth said good-by and told them to look for her the next day.

When Beth reached home she told her mother where she had been and what she had done. Mrs. Gill gathered up a lot of Beth's clothes and Aunty Lue gave some of Amy's clothes. Mrs. Roberts gave some of Junior's clothes.

Mrs. Gill packed all the clothes in boxes. Junior gave his trains to the little boy. Amy gave one of her dolls and Beth gave some of her books.

The next day Mrs. Gill put them in her car and she and Beth took them to Mrs. Reed's. "Mother," said Beth, "can't I give Mrs. Reed the $10 I won for dressing the prettiest doll at the fair?"

"Yes, Beth, if it will make you happy."

When they reached the Reed's all were waiting for them. Mrs. Reed was very happy and the children loved their things.

Beth promised to come each week and bring them something. Mrs. Gill said she would get people to buy Mrs. Reed's flowers and she would get some sewing for her.

They all said good-by.

When Beth and her mother got home, Beth told her she was the happiest girl in the world. Her mother kissed her and called her her "Sunshine Girl." Beth kept her promise and scattered sunshine wherever she went.

Washington and Its Beauties.

Washington is noted for its beautiful buildings. Some of the buildings are the Capitol, where the laws are made; the White House, where the President lives; the Washington Monument, which is 555 feet high; and the libraries where you get books.

Washington is also noted for its beautiful avenues. One of the most important avenues is Pennsylvania avenue.

Washington is a very clean city. The streets are clean all the time. So I hope other children will think the same about their city as I think about mine.

My Guiding Star.

There is a ladder climbing up
To you, my guiding star.
And up there upon its rosy top,
I see you from afar.
And sometimes you look down on me
And smile and then I will worship thee.

Each day I strive so hard to mount,
Where you have gone before.
And as each step is passed I count,
Old sorrow, now no more.
And so I learn through toil and woe
The things you learned so long ago.

Some day when many years have passed,
My pilgrimage will end.
And I shall come to you at last,
My ever faithful friend.
And we, with all the joys we've won,
Shall live and love till life is done.

The Most Interesting Thing in Our Town.

The most interesting thing in our city, Washington, D. C., in my opinion, is the National Museum, located on the Mall. It contains many historical features, among which is the Spirit of St. Louis, Col. Lindbergh's plane, that has gone through many dangers in crossing the Atlantic to make the first successful air trip or flight by a single aviator from New York to Paris. Painted on the side of the plane between the cockpit and the propeller are the flags of all countries Lindbergh flew through.

This building also has an interesting display of Edison Mazda electrical bulbs, from the smallest to the largest made, and also from the beginning of Edison's remarkable inventions up to his most modern model of electric bulbs.

In the National Museum are the different ways of transportation from the times of the pioneers up to the present.

The dresses of the Presidents' wives are on display.

The exact model of the Statue of Freedom that stands out so proudly on the National's Capitol is at the National Museum. It was sculptured in Rome, Italy, and is 19 feet 6 inches in height.

The dishes once used by George Washington are in the museum.

At the museum are thousands of geographic wonders as well as historic and scientific natural wonders.

I once had a Collie dog and she was very large and attractive. We played ball and had a good time together.

My daddy used to take us for long walks.

I have never had another pet to take her place.

And she chews my mitten.
She's like the puppy in every way.
She thinks she's smart
And tries to bark
And makes herself hoarser every day.

It was evening on the farm. The chickens had gone to roost; only the crickets could be heard. The stars were twinkling and the moon was bright. The road leading down the hill gleamed like a silver ribbon. We sat on the porch watching the stars. It was peaceful on the farm that night.

They both sing, but sometimes the love bird squawks like a parrot. The canary is golden yellow. The love bird is yellow, green, blue and black.

Judge bathes, but Milo does not.

We let them out of the cage sometimes to exercise.

Milo will sit on your finger if you hold your hand on each side of him.

They are both funny, but the love bird is the funnier.

A True Story.

During the war it was necessary for my mother, brother, sister and me to make the trip from Panama to the States. My father, being stationed down in Panama, was unable to come with us. If he only could have come it would have saved him a great scare. This is what happened.

On the trip up we could have no lights on deck at night because of the Germans. We were afraid of being sighted. Also we had to zigzag our course.

As we neared New York Harbor a transport carrying nurses and doctors across happened to be lying right in our path. The captain ordered full speed astern, but in the engine room they got the message wrong and went full speed ahead. We rammed the transport and made a hole in her. Every one on our boat was ordered to the assigned lifeboats. Not much damage was done to our boat, but the transport was slowly sinking. Most of the nurses and doctors climbed over to our boat, but some escaped in lifeboats. Just as we docked, the transport sunk.

The reason my father was scared was because this was the message received in Panama. "Panama (the name of our boat) rams transport." Naturally he did not know whether we were at the bottom of the ocean or not until we sent him full details.

JUNIOR BOOK REVIEWS

BANNERS OF SCOUTCRAFT. By John Francis Case (J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia).

This is a great book by a great man, the very one who wrote that fascinating book, "Under the 4-H Flag."

We certainly like Rod, straight and true as an Indian and chief of the Lone Scout troop. Of course it makes a better story to give credence to the tale that he was descended from an Indian princess. It was only a legend. Anyway Rod had the spirit of the boys and girls and men and women who were unafraid in the great open spaces and in the woods of his native land. Rod believed in his Indian ancestry and he also believed in the old lost copper mine.

He was the high hearted, courageous leader of the scouts who looked in vain for the old mine. One day the solution literally fell out of the sky. This was to be expected in an air-minded age for what writer would leave airplanes out of a story for boys and girls of this day. Anyway Lindstrom the young "barnstormer" was forced to land for repairs and read the book and find out the rest. There is plenty of mystery on which to sharpen your wits—adventure to keep you up to brave deeds—kidnaping, attacks from mountain desperadoes and many other exciting things in this book. The illustrations can not be lightly treated. They are full of the imagination and beauty Frank Eltonhead always gives to such pictures.

THE JUNGLE MEETING-POOL. By Mervyn Skipper (Frederick A. Stokes & Co., New ork).

Alice in Wonderland did not meet half as many original and fascinating animals as gather about the places of truce in the jungle meeting pool to discuss their common peril—the white man's destruction of the jungle. This was a most exciting convention, with the tiger and the python, the monkey and the mousedeer, the bear and the slow late arrival, the joris, holding conclave with great watchfulness about the meeting pool.

We never thought that the insects and animals we take as a matter of course or have never heard of at all have so much common sense and can teach us so many lessons of real statesmanship, fair play and the rights of not only many but of the birds of the air, the beasts of the field and the things which crawl on the earth and under it or flit above it. There is a great deal of humor in this book. No one could but enjoy reading the discussions and the conversational passages at arms and the many tales of wisdom. The white man's cub bring about a happy solution of the problem.

These are native jungle legends collected by an English father for his little daughters on a little island on the coast of Borneo. We know what every one in the story looks like and how they act, because R. W. Coulter has drawn them for us in the most attractive black and white effects.

My Trip to Great Falls.

One Sunday we took a trip to Great Falls. I had never been before, so it was all new to me.

Before we parked the car we could hear the rumble of the falls. We went on the Maryland side. As you know there is a swinging bridge. Oh! When we went across, my heart began to jump. I thought sure I was going to fall off. There is just a thin rail to hold on to.

At last we got across. To get to the falls we had to walk quite a distance. The scenery was perfectly beautiful. All the time we could hear the water.

Finally we reached the falls. I don't think I have ever seen anything so beautiful in my life. The water was leaping over rocks so rapid. I had expected to see just one fall, but there were many of them. I just couldn't leave them.

After a while we selected a nice shady place to have lunch. It sure did taste good.

After luncheon we sat on the rocks. Some of us read and others wrote. I did the last. I just had to write about the falls.

I hope all of you get a chance to see the beautiful falls. Next year I hope to see the Niagara Falls. I am sure they can not be any more interesting than Great Falls.

Dear Editor: Last Sunday while at dinner I got a wishbone, and I wished that the drawing I'm sending in would be published. Oh! I hope very much that my wish could come true. I love The Junior Post so much.

Dear Editor: I have been reading The Junior Post for a long time and enjoy it very much. I am sending in a poem. There have been some good stories and poems in the paper. I am a reader and a new member.

Yours truly,

Dear Editor: I am a constant reader of The Junior Post and I have decided to send in some poems and drawings, I am hoping they will be published.

A sincere member.
GEORGE L. DANT (age 13),

Dear Editor: I enjoy The Junior Post more than I can say. Always hoping it more success.

I am sending a drawing of mine in and I hope it will be published.

Very sincerely I remain, a reader,
K. LORENA POOLE,
1008 Douglas street northeast.

Dear Editor: I can not wait any longer to send you another story. Thanks for publishing my last story. I hope "Three Is a Crowd" will be published.

Sincerely yours,
ALICE G. STEIN (age 15).
Rock Point, Md.

Dear Editor: I have just returned from my two weeks' vacation, and I did not know my story was published until today. Success to our Junior Post.

VIRGINIA GRUMMAN.

Dear Editor: My pin came yesterday; it is beautiful and I am very proud of it. When I opened the envelope I danced for joy. Mother is going to have a safety clasp put on so I won't lose it. Thank you for sending it to me.

I showed the pin to my teacher and told her how glad I was to have it to wear. My sister and I always read The Post and enjoy the stories, poems and drawings. Now I really belong to the Junior Writers Club and that makes me happy.

At school we are making a book. The teacher reads one chapter of Pinnochio to us and then we have to write the next one and make drawing to go with what we write. At the end of the year we bind the books and have them to keep. Some of them are funny.

Last week I was in New York and went to Coney Island. Sometime I will write a story about it. Your faithful reader,

DAVID S. ROBERTS, JR.

Dear Editor: This is a serial story I have written especially for The Junior Post. I am also sending in some poems I have written.

My pin seemed to inspire me to greater heights and I am going to keep on writing until I receive prize after prize and then more. Hoping that my humble contributions are accepted, I remain,

GRETCHEN HILL.
2017 Fifth street northwest.

Dear Editor: Thank you for printing my poem and letter. I am inclosing a try for the serial, and also a poem entitled "Mr. Brown's Car," which I hope you will like well enough to publish. I certainly wish my chapter will be good enough to be "the" chapter, but I hardly dare to hope.

Wishing The Junior Post all success, I remain,

PEARL GOLDENBERG.
500 Eleventh street southeast.

Dear Editor: I inclose the item requested on "The Most Interesting Thing I Heard This Week." It's very short, but I hope you like it.

I guess that this time next week I'll be back to school and "pegging" away at the old textbooks. I'll be in my second year high. My brother will be a freshman. Best wishes for The Junior Post. Sincerely,

MILDRED MILLER.
Fort George G. Meade, Md.

Dear Editor: I've been reading The Junior Post every Sunday, and I think it is a very interesting paper for boys and girls. So I am sending in a story and hope you will publish it in the Sunday paper.

GERALDINE MORRIS (age 11).

Dear Editor: I want to thank you for publishing my drawings. I have had nine or ten in so far.

I have been reading The Junior Post ever since I can remember. My sisters and I have a regular scramble for it every Sunday morning.

I am sending in a strip which I hope will be published.

Thanking you again and wishing our little paper success, I am, a constant reader,

Dear Editor: I read the Junior Post every Sunday and enjoy it very much. This is the first picture I have sent in, and I hope that you will accept it.

I am 12 years old and I go to the Gordon Junior High School.

Yours truly,
JEAN OGLE.
4462 Conduit road.

Dear Editor: I am a reader of The Junior Post every Sunday, and it is the first piece of paper I look for every Sunday. After reading all the nice stories and poems I thought I would try to do something. Inclosed is a little short play. I would like very much to see it published. "To win you must try." I think that slogan is right. Well, I guess I have said all I can, so I will close hoping to see my play published in the best part of any paper, The Junior Post, soon. Very sincerely yours,

MARGARET CORNWELL (8B).

Dear Editor: I have been reading The Junior Post for three years. I am sending in a drawing which I hope will be published. I want to get a membership pin as soon as I can. Dear Editor: I was glad to see my picture printed in The Junior Post last Sunday. I am sending in another picture called "Memories." I am hoping to win the strip prize or cartoon prize some day. Graf Zeppelin.

When that huge Zeppelin spanned the city
When it came from Germany,
Many were enthused;
Traffic paused,
Child looked from its play,
It was midday
And the Zeppelin in the sky
Was looked upon by many an eye.

It came across
And we read these wonderful words across:
"Graf Zeppelin."

And many a tear came to the eye
To thank God while they looked at the sky;
That they lived to see this huge ship,
The Columbus of the sky.

Five Great Presidents.

George Washington, our first President, was the Father of Our Country. He was born on February 22, 1732, in Westmoreland County, Va. He was the oldest son of Augustine and Mary Ball Washington. He became a surveyor in 1784 as the age of 16. Three years later he was a major in the Army. Washington fought in the French and Indian wars, always showing braveness, truth and loyalty. Because of his bravery and wisdom he was chosen commanding general during the Revolution. George always loved the truth—the story of the cherry tree proves that! The six years of war, a long war, too, made many of the colonists weaken, but the brave leader never gave up, thus winning their liberty. At the age of 57, in 1789, Washington was chosen President. He served two terms. Some years later, at his home in Virginia, he died. He was buried in his beloved estate.

John Adams, the second of our Presidents, was born October 30, 1735, at Braintree, Mass. He graduated from Harvard in 1755. He was a great teacher for a short time. He became a lawyer at the age of 23. He was married to Abigail Smith in 1764. One of his own sons, John Quincy Adams, became one of our Presidents later! Adams was a leader against the mother country; also was a signer of the Declaration of Independence.

When Washington refused a third term, the country elected John Adams, although Thomas Jefferson, who opposed him, was a close second. Adams served just one term. He was a very old man when he died at 90, and died on the same day as Thomas Jefferson. He was buried at Quincy Mass., in 1826.

Thomas Jefferson, our third President, was born on April 13, 1743, in Virginia. He was a student at William and Mary College, and graduated in 1762. He became a lawyer in the year of 1767. He was the author of the Declaration of Independence, which was written on July 4, 1776.

Jefferson was Vice President under John Adams. He then served eight years as President (from 1801 to 1809). He carried through during his term of office the Louisiana Purchase, which gave us the great Western lands, then owned by Lewis and Clark.

Jefferson was a great writer and devoted his later days to it. He died on July 4, 1826, 50 years after the Declaration of Independence. He was 83 years of age.

James Madison, the fourth President of the United States, was one of the young men of the Revolution, as he was born on March 16, 1751, in Prince George County, Va. He graduated from Princeton in 1771. He studied law, which was a great profession for all young men. Madison was a follower of Jefferson and succeeded him, becoming President at 57.

It was in Madison's second term, in 1812, that war was declared on England, because of that country's continued search of American vessels on the sea, even though this was not right.

When Madison retired in 1817 he left behind him a great era of good feeling, and his successor, James Monroe, carried on James Madison's policy. Madison died on June 28, 1836, at Montpelier, Va., at the age of 85.

James Monroe became fifth President, receiving more than five times the vote of Rufus King, who ran against him. In his second term he received more than 231 votes against 1 for John Quincy Adams. Monroe was in college at the time of the Revolutionary War, but he left immediately to fight for his country. During Monroe's term the country acquired Florida, Missouri, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama and Maine.

In 1824 Lafayette returned to the United States for a visit.

Monroe died July 4, 1831, in New York at the age of 73.

Pagie in the Mountains.

"Oh, dear," sighed Pagie, as she awoke one morning, "it's raining, and now we can't go for the picnic.

"Is it true?" cried Eleanor. She ran to the door of the tent and looked out.

Indeed, it was true, for the rain was falling silently and fast, making no noise as it fell.

The two girls were out camping in the mountains for the summer, with Mr. and Mrs. Martin, and some other girls.

They got up and dressed, and then hurried to the dining tent, where they found the others were there before them.

After breakfast they built a fire and told stories until noon.

"Maybe it will clear up," suggested Marion hopefully. Then they ate lunch.

After lunch it did clear up.

"We will take our supper and go driving and eat out somewhere," said Mrs. Martin.

So they started out, when it was supper time, they stopped to eat.

Pagie saw some pretty flowers nearby, and ran to pick them. But she kept seeing more and more flowers and she ran to pluck them.

Finally she turned to go back, but she could not find the way. She called—no one answered.

After searching around for a while, she realized she was lost.

Frightened, she stumbled on and on into the darkness.

"I wonder why it is so dark," she said.

Finally the rain began to pour down, and threatening clouds huddled together like frightened sheep.

On and on she stumbled. Her slipper came unbuttoned and unable to find it, she was forced to continue over cruel stones that hurt her feet, on and on until she fell down—down—down.

Meanwhile the ones at the supper started a frantic search for her. They called, they shouted—no response.

Mr. Martin went to the hotel and got Pagie's father and some other men and they started a search for her.

After what seemed hours, Pagie woke up to find herself being carried in a cabin door by a man and his son.

They laid her on a bed, and the man's wife gave her some gruel and hot tea.

Two or three little children clustered around the bed.

"We found you on the mountain unconscious," said the man. "You can stay until your people come for you."

Pagie found it hard to get to sleep, but she finally dropped off.

Meanwhile the men hunted for her, but their search was fruitless.

When morning came, they saw a little cabin in the valley.

"She might have wandered there and stayed there for the night," said Mr. Martin.

And there they found her.

"Oh, daddy!" cried Page. "I'm so glad you found me."

Page's father gave the man $10 and they returned to the hotel.

When they got there every one was glad to see them, for they had worried "their heads nearly off," as Marion put it.

The Most Interesting Thing I Heard Last Week.

The week has gone by and hundreds of things of interest have occurred—completion of the Hearst-Zeppelin round-the-world flight, uprisings of the Jews and Arabs in Palestine and ever so many more interesting occurrences. But the thing that interested me most was hardly noticeable in a remote corner of a Baltimore newspaper. It told how very old and rare books are being preserved and yet the public may read them without handling them.

Each page is photographed on a slot and are then shown in theaters and people may read them without handling them. It is in this fashion that the books are preserved. The idea originated in Germany.

A Pirate.

There's a pirate in the hall, so be careful one and all,
For he's really very cruel and very bold,
With flopping boots of red, and a scarf around his head,
He is plundering the merchant ships of gold.

Big earrings in his ears, for he hasn't any fears,
He flies the Jolly Roger at the mast.
So avast there you below, come on and make her go.
Heave to now, for she must be scooting fast.

See him strut, so tall and grand, with a dagger in his hand,
And a cutlass and some pistols in his sash.
We dare not venture near, for as sure as you are here
You'd come back with cuts and bullet hole and gash.

But he isn't very big, and he's wearing sister's wig,
Each tiny foot in a big, black shiny boot.
For he's just a little lad, but oh! what fun he had,
With a big bunch of golden dandelions for loot.

Lightning.

"Get that good-for-nothing dog out of here, Jimmy." This was spoken by an aged man around 70 to Jimmy Webb.

"Granddaddy," replied Jimmy, "why can't you learn to love Lightning as I have?"

"Bah!" replied the old man, "that old police dog will never be any good. Put it in the backyard and keep it there," he added.

The dog which has caused so much trouble, Lightning, a Belgian police dog, was a huge dog and with much intelligence.

"Come on, Lightning, boy," Jimmy said kindly, "I'll put you in the backyard but I will see you get out." There was, of course, no answer, but the dog looked at Jimmy with shiny black eyes in the most grateful way.

Jimmy Webb lived in a large house with his mother and father, grandmother and grandfather. It was rather far from the town where they could buy food or medicine or any other necessity. So when they did go into town they had to buy an amount of things so that they would not need to go in town for a long while again.

Jimmy was a youth of 16 but was very alert and smart. He was a good looking chap. He had red hair, blue eyes, a cute pug nose, lovely teeth and a fine complexion. Jimmy had owned Lightning ever since he could remember and loved him with all his heart. Jimmy's grandfather had hated animals, which explained his attitude toward Lightning.

One day Jimmy's grandfather became very ill. It was necessary that Jim go in town and get a certain kind of medicine. He took Lightning with him. After a few hours he returned with the medicine.

The medicine appeared to be just the aid for Mr. Dux (Jimmie's grandfather) and he was recovering quickly, but he had to have complete quietness.

One night a huge storm came up. Minute by minute the storm increased. Mr. Dux suddenly grew terribly ill and asked for his medicine. Unfortunately, the medicine was gone.

On and on the storm grew worse as Mr. Dux did also. "We have just got to have that medicine," Jimmie's mother said desperately. "But no human being can reach the doctor's in this storm," she added.

Jimmy said nothing but his brain was clicking away as fast as a clock. Suddenly he burst out, "You said no human being could get through the storm, but could an animal?" he cried excitedly.

"What do you mean, Jimmy," his mother stammered.

"I mean this," replied Jimmy, catching his breath, "I took Lightning with me the other day when I got the medicine and I bet he knows exactly where the doctor is. We can tie a note around his neck and the doctor can tie the medicine, too. Please let him go. I have always known Lightning to be a wonderful dog, now let him prove it. Jimmy was so excited he was almost in tears.

His mother looked at him and for the first time in her life she realized what a wonderful boy he was. Here he was ready to sacrifice his best friend, his truest and best pal, his dog. For a moment she could not speak.

"All right," she said suddenly, "send Lightning."

Soon Jimmy got Lightning and wrote a note, putting it around the dog's neck. The note read: "Please give dog the medicine for Mr. Dux. He is very ill. Tie medicine around dog's neck."

Quickly Jimmy opened the front door. "Lightning," he cried loudly, "go to the doctor's and rap on the door as hard as you can. The dog's ears went up as an answer. He dashed out like a flash as if trying to live up to his name, Lightning.

The storm continued. The wind was like that of a thousand wild beasts, while the angry thunder crashed louder and louder. Now and then a huge streak of lightning would light up the sky, like a giant skyrocket at some large celebration.

Minute by minute the time went by. Had Lightning been hurt? Would he never see him again?

Suddenly Jimmy heard a scratch at the door. Was it the wind or his wonderful dog. He opened the door and Lightning rushed in, soaking wet but with the looks of a real hero.

The medicine proved to be worthy and Mr. Dux was at ease. Lightning was not hurt in the least and was allowed to sleep in the parlor next to the warm fireplace. The storm's fury soon ended and the whole family went to bed.

A week later Jimmie's grandfather was in fine health due to Lightning's heroic deed.

Peace.

A hilltop in the twilight
Wrapped in shadows, deep
A forest, dark and silent
In a purple sleep . . .
A river flowing onward
Eager for the sea;—
Overhead, a jewelled sky
And the moon's eternal mystery . . .
And I, heartsore and weary
Find a great relief—
In the joy of beauty,
In the calm of peace.

DOROTHEA LAMORE.

Carrot's Solos.

Carol Mayne threw her book down with a bang. Why couldn't she pilot an airplane as well as a boy? Ever since Col. Lindbergh made that epochal flight to Paris, Carol had been interested in flying.

She knew its history from the first successful glide of the Wright brothers at Kitty Hawk, N. C., to the latest around-the-world flight of the Graf Zeppelin.

"Hey, Carrots! I win," shouted a voice near at hand. Instantly Carol was alert.

"Jimmy, you did? What is it this time, a medal the size of a dime, or a miniature loving cup?" she teased.

"Neither," came the reply. "Seriously, I'm going up in a real airplane at Mineola."

Jimmy Mayne was an earnest member of the Model Aircraft League of Fairfield, N. Y., and had won several laurels. He did what Carol couldn't do "because," as she explained, "I'm not a boy."

In Fairfield girls were not eligible to enter aircraft meets of any kind. To console herself Carol made diagrams of planes with improvements of her own. This latest exploit of Jim's was almost unbearable to her. It was bad enough to see his medals, which really partly belonged to her!

The day dawned when Jimmy took flight, leaving a very much depressed and crestfallen twin sister behind.

"Carrots, but it was fun! Terry Langford took me up. I told him about you, and it seems your diagrams are real accurate, so he showed them to a Roosevelt Field official and, Carrots, maybe you are goin' to fly, too."

"Jimmy," said Carrots, in a queer throaty voice, "you mean they think I deserve it?"

"Sure; and what is more, they think you're a genius, and might teach you how to fly free," he replied.

* * * *

"Contact!" shouted the mechanic as a Ryan monoplane warmed up.

"Contact," replied the pilot. With a roaring hum of the motor the plane shot forward and Carol Mayne enjoyed the delightful sensation of leaving "terra firma" for the first time. Now she began to accustom herself to the ship. It was a two-seater, dual control, the kind used for student pilots. The rush of the wind was on her cheek, rivers were like narrow ribbons, houses were mere specks. Then, before she knew it they were back to earth again.

Carol proved to be just made for flying and in a short time was enrolled as a student pilot.

Toward the end of summer Jimmy left for a camp in Massachusetts, while Carol was preparing to solo.

Tim left camp at 9 a. m. via airplane, expecting to arrive in New York at noon. Carol was at the airport awaiting his arrival. Twelve o'clock no Jimmy. Two, still no sign of his plane. By 5 Carol was very uneasy.

"Mr. Nelson," she implored, "can't I solo now? They all say I'm ready."

"Solo! Now! Impossible. Yes, I know you're ready, but don't worry. Tut, tut, my child, it's out of the question entirely. But Mason or Sterling, or even Veeds, could search. But you——" he shook his head.

At 7 a wireless was received and Carol given permission to solo and she immediately set out for the Connecticut wilderness whence the call for aid came. Flying as low as she dared, Carol saw what appeared to be bits of a wrecked plane.

Several days later Carol was presented with a Ryan single seater for the heroic rescue of T. Vangherd and James Mayne.

"Well, Carrot Top, it isn't so bad to be a girl after all, is it?" inquired Jim.

"No, not now," she replied. In fact, I really think it's fun."

When engineers decided to harness the Father of Waters, it required big things done in a big way. This view shows the Keokuk Dam on the Mississippi, the locks of which are said to be stronger than those of the Panama Canal. The power house is fifteen stories high from river bed to top and can furnish power enough to light every home in the United States.

WHAT WESTINGHOUSE IS DOING TO MODERNIZE TRANSPORTATION

DRAWN FOR WESTINGHOUSE BY C. PETER HELCK

WESTINGHOUSE WORKS HAND IN HAND WITH STREET CAR COMPANIES TO GIVE YOU BETTER TRANSPORTATION

Electricity's carrying capacity grows with the crowd

Down from towering offices, out from busy factories, flock the city's workers. It is evening, a day's work is done, and all are impatiently eager to be home.

Each year sees this crowd grow denser, as the homes of business and industry reach higher into the sky. Each year sees the homeward journey longer, as the workers' dwellings spread farther into the country. And each year finds flexible street car capacity to meet the erratic demands of rush hours as well as of dull hours, though few streets are wider.

Electricity's carrying capacity grows with the crowd. Now it is with larger, roomier, quieter cars, and lowered floors that quicken loading and unloading. Again it is with more powerful cars, that shorten the time of starting and stopping.

In addition to these important improvements made possible in congested downtown areas, electricity also has enabled street railway companies to adopt important auxiliaries to the street car in order to keep pace with today's rapidly extending suburbs. Of these the electric trolley-bus requires no rails to run on, but draws its power from double over-head wires and travels on resilient rubber tires. The gas-electric bus combines the comfort of the street car with the unlimited range of the more familiar motor coach.

Behind the scenes of this transportation drama, Westinghouse engineers are working continuously to create electrical equipment that satisfies each new requirement. Westinghouse, originator of the first practical street railway motor, still pioneers — not only in improving the cars and busses but also in developing the extensive equipment that insures their power supply. Westinghouse fosters every service that electricity provides.

Look years younger

Sallow, Dingy Skin made Lovely —Coarse Pores become Fine—It corrects oily skin, heals eruptions and dissolves blackheads.

The newest discovery in beauty culture is that creamed magnesia is much better for the complexion than any soap or cleansing cream. It beautifies the skin instantly, in the same easy way that milk of magnesia purifies the stomach. This is because skin impurities are acid. Doctors treat acid inside the body with milk of magnesia. And now, dermatologists are getting amazing results in banishing complexion faults with creamed magnesia. All you do is anoint your skin with it, massage and rinse with water. It's as simple as washing your face.

It reduces enlarged pores to the finest, smoothest texture almost as if by magic. Being astringent, it drives away the tell-tale signs of age. You will marvel at the effect of your first five-minute facial massage. It rejuvenates the skin so quickly that any woman can look years younger tonight. It's marvelous how magnesia dissolves blackheads, clears eruptions and corrects oily skin.

And because it is so mild, mothers use it instead of soap to bathe babies. It certainly is a blessing to have a face wash for those sensitive skins that soap so easily irritates and coarsens. Being tasteless, it can not fail to whiten face or gray hair. It removes make-up, grime, impurities from the pores better than soap or cold cream.

No More Ugly Nose Pores

dull, sallow skin to radiant clearness and fades out freckles better than a bushel of lemons. Test it on those clogged nose pores that stand out so boldly. Let it whiten your neck. It will also keep your hands soft and white. Until recently, creamed magnesia was used only by New York doctors' wives and nurses. But now the large druggists everywhere find it have to keep enough on hand to supply the demand. To get genuine creamed magnesia, ask for Denton's Facial Magnesia. Remember, five minutes works wonders. So, get your magnesia today and look lovely tonight. It costs almost nothing to try. It's

NOTE: Do not hesitate to try this marvelous skin treatment at once. Thousands of delighted women have written they could not believe anything so simple could be so wonderful. But they were convinced when they saw so many friends suddenly get lovely complexions.

Millions of American women now buy only this aged Ginger Ale

This glass shows how much more you get in every bottle

It gives 1/3 more for your money

CLICQUOT CLUB Pale Dry is the only nationally known dry ginger ale that comes in full 16-ounce bottles. The others come in so-called "pints" containing only 12 ounces each.

This startling fact has been discovered by many millions of thrifty American housewives. And so they have tried Clicquot Club Pale Dry, and no other suits them now.

Why Clicquot is Aged

Years ago Clicquot Club discovered a secret process of ageing their ginger ale. This secret has been jealously guarded. It is known to Clicquot Club alone. You'll never find the same mellow flavor in any other ginger ale.

Every bottle of Clicquot Club Pale Dry contains fine Jamaica ginger, pure table sugar, mellow syrup of ripe fruit juices and pure spring water with a double-charge carbonation. Skillful blending and careful ageing produce a rare mellow flavor such as you have never known before.

So by all means insist on Clicquot Club Pale Dry when you buy ginger ale. It is aged. And it comes in full 16-ounce pints, much more economical than the wasteful near-quart that may "go flat" before you can use it up, or the little 12-ounce "pint" that isn't enough to go around. Clicquot Club always comes in clean, new full-pint bottles. At your dealer's today.

AM I SEEING THINGS? IF THAT ISN'T LITTLE CHESTER RAKING AND BURNING THOSE LEAVES—

I MUST SAY HE'S DONE A SWELL JOB OF IT TOO— WONDER WHAT HE'S UP TO NOW — HEADED STRAIGHT FOR THE GARAGE—

WELL— I'LL BE DOG GONE! HE'S GOING TO WASH MY CAR— CAN YOU BEAT THAT?

JUST LOOK AT HIM POLISHING THAT CAR— HE'S GOT IT LOOKING LIKE A MIRROR— WHO'D EVER THINK THAT KID COULD WORK LIKE THAT—

FROM ONE THING TO ANOTHER— NOW IT'S THAT BROKEN GATE— MIN'S BEEN AFTER ME TO FIX THAT FOR THE PAST MONTH— JUST MINDING HIS OWN BUSINESS— AND DOING THINGS— GOLLY— I CAN'T HELP BUT FEEL PROUD OF HIM—

GOSH— THERE'S NO LET UP TO THAT KID— HE'S DONE MORE NOW THAN A MAN WOULD DO IN A WEEK — I DON'T SEE HOW I CAN EVER FORGIVE MYSELF FOR EVER SPEAKING HARSH TO HIM OR SPANKING HIM— THAT KID'S ONE IN A MILLION—

THERE HE GOES INTO THE HOUSE NOW— I'LL SNEAK IN THROUGH THE FRONT DOOR AND PRETEND I HAVEN'T BEEN WATCHING HIM—

MY BOY— I WANT TO COMPLIMENT YOU ON THE WAY YOU'VE BEEN BEHAVING YOURSELF OF LATE — DON'T THINK I HAVEN'T BEEN NOTICING THE IMPROVEMENT IN YOU— ALWAYS REMEMBER YOUR OLD DAD KNOWS WHETHER OR NOT YOU'VE BEEN KEEPING OUT OF MISCHIEF—

I'M NOT THE KIND THAT ONLY CALLS HIS BOY ON THE MAT FOR THE THINGS HE SHOULDN'T HAVE DONE— BUT WHEN I SEE YOU ARE DESERVING FOR THE GOOD DEEDS YOU DO I'LL LET YOU KNOW— AND TO SHOW YOU HOW MUCH I APPRECIATE THE WAY YOU'VE BEEN PROGRESSING— I'M GOING TO REWARD YOU WITH A BRAND NEW ONE DOLLAR BILL— NOW, YOU JUST RUN ALONG AND TAKE IN A MOVIE AND GET YOURSELF SOME ICECREAM—

BY THE 'WAY, PA— I FORGOT TO TELL YOU— THERE'S A LETTER FOR YOU ON THE MANTEL—

Dear Mr. Gump—
Your attention is called to the fact that your son, Chester's conduct during class can no longer be tolerated. Unless he takes a turn for the better, he will be dismissed from school.
Trusting that you may take a hand in this matter.

THIS GAME IS TO DECIDE THE CAPTAINCY OF THE SCHOOL ELEVEN BETWEEN BULL AND BLACKIE! FIGHT HARD AND PLAY CLEAN, AND REMEMBER THAT STRATEGY HAS WON MORE GAMES THAN BRUTE FORCE!

WITH MY BRAINS I'M A CINCH TO BE CAPTAIN WHEN THE GAME'S OVER! WHEN I START THINKING MY FOREHEAD LIGHTS UP LIKE AN ELECTRIC GLOBE!

THIS FIELD IS TOO SHORT! THE FENCE IS ONLY A COUPLE OF YARDS BACK OF THE GOAL POSTS, SO IT'S IMPOSSIBLE TO KICK FROM BEHIND GOAL! I'LL HAVE TO BE CAREFUL ABOUT THAT AND NOT GET CORNERED!

LIE DOWN, BULL, AND REST YOURSELF! YOU'RE NOT GOING ANY PLACE WITH THAT BALL!

UMPH!

FOURTH DOWN, AND WE'VE BEEN THROWN FOR SO MANY LOSSES I'LL HAVE TO KICK FROM BEHIND GOAL—ONLY THAT'S IMPOSSIBLE!

HOT DOG! JUST WHAT I WAS WAITING FOR! NOW IF HE ONLY SAYS THE RIGHT THING I'LL GIVE HIM THE RIGHT ANSWER AND THROW IN A SURPRISE FOR GOOD MEASURE LATER ON!

SAY, BLACKIE! I'M AGAINST THE FENCE AND CAN'T PUNT! NOT ENOUGH ROOM! WILL YOUR SIDE LEND US TEN YARDS SO I CAN KICK?

BORROW ALL THE YARDAGE YOU WANT—ON CONDITION THAT YOU PAY US BACK ANY TIME WE ASK YOU!

THAT FOOTBALL JUST EATS OUT OF MY HAND! JUST TO SHOW I'M GRATEFUL, I'LL CARRY IT TO THE GOAL THAT ALL GOOD FOOTBALLS STRIVE TO REACH!

FIVE YARDS THROUGH CENTER AND ONLY TWENTY MORE YARDS TO GO FOR A TOUCHDOWN! THE SCORE IS NOTHING TO NOTHING, AND ONLY FIVE MORE MINUTES TO PLAY BEFORE THE GAME IS CALLED!

20

THERE'S NOTHING BACKWARD ABOUT MY FORWARD PASSES! THAT ONE IS GOOD FOR ELEVEN YARDS!

ONE MINUTE LEFT TO PLAY!

LISTEN, BULL, YOU OWE US TEN YARDS AND WE'LL COLLECT RIGHT NOW! AND WE WON'T CHARGE YOU AN INCH INTEREST!

GUESS THERE'S NO WAY OUT OF IT! I PROMISED TO PAY ON DEMAND!

WE WERE ON YOUR NINE YARD LINE! WE TAKE BACK THE TEN YARDS YOU BORROWED AND THAT PUTS US ONE YARD ACROSS YOUR GOAL FOR A TOUCHDOWN.

GOSH, I NEVER THOUGHT OF THAT!

THE GAME'S OVER! YOU WERE JUST IN TIME, BLACKIE, AND THAT'S THE SMARTEST BIT OF GENERALSHIP I'VE SEEN IN A LONG TIME! THE SCORE IS SIX TO NOTHING, AND BLACKIE IS NOW CAPTAIN OF THE FIRST TEAM!

THAT TEN YARDS CARRIED ME A LONG WAY!
